Current tax law is unfairly biased against saving due to double taxation. The United States, under any measure of savings (inclusive of business saving) ranks last or second to last compared to our major trading partners. After the Japanese essentially eliminated the double taxation of savings in their country after World War II, their savings rate doubled (see chart). A major opportunity will be missed if tax reform does not include major savings incentives to remove the double taxation of savings.

Super Savings Accounts (SUSAs): SUSAs, as described in S. 243, would function much like IRAs except that the savings could be used for any purpose. Current contributions to SUSAs would be tax deductible and savings would be taxed when withdrawn. There would be no additional tax penalty for early withdrawal. Limits would be set at $3,000 for those filing singly and $6,000 for joint returns. In combination with IRAs, this would result in savings vehicles totaling $5,000 per year for individuals and $10,000 for couples.

The SUSAs would be phased in over three years at the rate of $1,000 per year for individuals ($2,000 per year for joint returns).

401K Plans: These tax deferred savings plans have been very effective savings vehicles and should not be cut back as in H.R. 3838. The Roth proposal would maintain current law treatment of 401K plans.

Spousal IRA: The current $250 limit on spousal IRAs discriminates against those that choose to work in the home and also inhibits savings. Under the Roth Reforms, the spousal IRA limit would be increased to $2,000.

BUSINESS PROVISIONS

Corporate Rate Reduction: High marginal tax rates, whether on the individual or corporate side, are a deterrent to economic growth. Senator Roth proposes to lower the top corporate rate to 33 percent. Graduation of corporate rates will be retained.

Depreciation: By slowing down depreciation schedules and eliminating the Investment Tax Credit, current tax reform proposals would increase the cost of capital to American business. The goal of equalizing the tax treatment across industries is laudable, but not at the expense of increased capital costs, decreased investment and slower economic growth. It is possible to achieve neutrality across industries without dramatically increasing the cost of capital to American companies. This is achieved by restoring much of the initial cash flow that is taken away in both the House bill and the President's package.

Roth's proposal to implement the Expense Cost Recovery System (ECRS) would involve a combination of first year expensing and CCRS, the President's proposal. A firm would expense 50 percent of equipment costs and depreciate the remainder according to CCRS. A half year convention would be in place. Asset categories would be the same as under the President's plan and indexing of the basis would be retained. ECRS would apply to categories 1 through 5 in the President's plan.

Corporate Minimum Tax Rate: Because it is commonly accepted that every company should pay its fair share of tax, a minimum tax is an important element of a tax reform proposal. However, the high tax rate in H.R. 3838 unfairly and adversely affects new businesses. The centerpiece of the Roth Reforms, the Business Transfer Tax (BTT) has many of the attributes of a minimum tax. A high rate of minimum tax coupled with the BTT would be redundant and hurt entrepreneurial activity. In the Roth proposal, the minimum tax rate would be 15 percent.

Miscellaneous: Money would be available to address other areas such as the foreign provisions, as well as to pay for necessary transition rules associated with the BTT. For example, a transition rule would be in order for firms who have invested in large amounts of capital before the effective date of the BTT. They would be taxed on the value added from that capital without any corresponding offset. This is especially a concern to currently unprofitable firms with large amounts of unused credits and deductions. They should not be hit by a new tax just when they are trying to become competitive.

THE BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX

The Roth Reforms would be financed by introduction of a Business Transfer Tax (BTT). The BTT is a net receipts tax on all domestic business. Each firm would calculate its tax base by calculating gross receipts from the domestic sale of goods and services and subtracting purchases of inputs such as raw materials and capital. The tax rate would be applied to this net receipts base.

As a replacement tax, the BTT, in general, should have no effect on the price level. However, if it became evident that the BTT would impact unfairly on low-income families, a sliding credit, modelled after the earned income credit, would be available for the poor. Money for the sliding credit would be set aside.

All firms with under $10 million in gross receipts would be exempt from the tax. To avoid undue hardship to those firms with gross receipts slightly in excess of $10 million, phased in rates would be developed only for firms with between $10 million and $20 million of gross receipts.

The BTT would be fully creditable against the employers portion of the Social Security Payroll Tax (FICA). In addition, BTT liability in excess of FICA would be deductible against income for corporate and individual income tax purposes.

All imports would be taxed at the full BTT rate with the foreign exporter being held liable. A credit mechanism would insure that the BTT on exports is rebated.

The BTT would extend to all sectors in the economy including financial services. Rules would be developed to equitably measure value added in these industries and to maintain competitive balances.

The BTT rate would be set at 8 percent. To make sure that the BTT is not abused, once implemented, a ⅗ majority in both Houses would be required to increase the BTT tax rate.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

1. Won't the BTT result in higher consumer prices?

The BTT is not a net tax increase, but a replacement tax. Because the BTT is replacing taxes which are already part of a firm's cost structure, generally speaking, there will be no increase in domestic prices. There may, however, be an increase in the price of imports. This is necessary if American goods and foreign goods are to be treated equally. It is true, also, that firms who have managed to avoid paying taxes in the past will have to pay the BTT. Whether these latter taxes would be passed on would depend on the competitive situation of the particular business.

2. What will be the impact on small business and family farms?

Due to the exemption for organizations with gross receipts below $10 million, all small businesses and family farms will be exempt from the BTT.

3. Won't the BTT result in an enormous tax increase?

With any broad-based tax, there is apprehension by some that it will be used to generate revenues to fuel government spending. The Roth proposal is a revenue neutral tax reform package. Senator Roth will oppose use of the BTT to increase the overall tax burden. To prevent the BTT from being misused, there is a provision requiring a ⅗ majority vote in each House of Congress for any BTT rate increases.

4. Why is the BTT preferable to a European VAT?

The BTT presents little new administrative burden for either business or the Internal Revenue Service. Each firm would file for the BTT at exactly the same time that the corporate or individual income tax is filed. In fact, the BTT would be an addendum to that form. The estimated tax rules will be the same as under the income tax. No additional record keeping will be required of business as a result of the BTT.

The European VAT, on the other hand, involves major new compliance costs. The VAT is collected through an "invoice and credit" method. This means that each firm pays a tax on total sales, and then gets a credit for the tax paid on all the goods that went into the production process. The firm must keep track of all invoices in order to get the proper amount of credits and must make sure that all its suppliers paid their taxes. This forces firms to assume the additional burden of policing the tax system on top of enormous new record keeping.

5. How will the Roth proposal affect the cost of capital?

The Roth proposal will reduce the cost of capital in several ways. It contains a very valuable capital recovery system—an Expensing Cost Recovery System (ECRS)—and lower corporate rates. It will increase U.S. savings by building new savings incentives into the tax code, thereby making more capital available for investment. Capital costs to American businesses will be much lower than under H.R. 3838 and will make American businesses competitive in international markets.

6. What will the Roth reforms do to the national savings rate?

By reducing the double taxation of savings, over a period of time, people will be more inclined to save part of their earnings. In companies with 401K or other tax deferred savings plans, employees of all income groups have higher savings rates than their counterparts in companies that don't offer these plans. While some claim that the reduction of marginal rates and liberalization of IRAs in 1981 have not stimulated personal savings, this is a false perception. The National Income and Products Accounts definition of personal savings includes corporate contributions to pension funds. However, if actual household savings are singled out, it becomes evident that people are saving more as a result of the savings incentives of 1981.

Even the Japanese, whose personal savings far surpass Americans', were not always prolific savers. Japan's national savings rate increased dramatically after World War II, when changes in the Japanese tax code essentially eliminated the double taxation of saving.

7. Isn't the BTT a regressive tax?

The BTT is a proportionate tax on the incomes from capital and labor, and is used to replace taxes of similar incidence already paid by business. As such, there is no reason to assume the tax will be passed on any more than the tax it replaces. For those firms that have managed to avoid taxes in the past, there is the possibility that they will try to pass on some or all of the BTT. Their willingness to increase their prices to compensate for the BTT will depend on the market conditions of their particular industry.

If it becomes apparent that the BTT might have a disproportionate effect on low income families, a refundable credit, similar to the earned income credit, which phases out at stated income levels could be implemented.

8. Won't the use of the FICA Credit undermine the Social Security System?

The Social Security System is not in any way changed by this proposal. Firms still will be liable for the same amount of FICA tax as before the BTT, and all amounts will go directly to the Social Security Trust Fund. The BTT revenues are simply earmarked to fulfill the FICA liability.

9. Is this a protectionist proposal?

An important feature of this proposal is that it harmonizes our tax system with that of our major trading partners. Under international treaty, so-called indirect taxes (taxes on products) are to be levied in the country in which they are consumed. Taxes on exports are rebated and imports are taxed as they cross the border. Our trading partners raise more revenue through indirect taxes than the United States. Because of this, there is an inherent bias against American exports and in favor of foreign imports. Imposition of the BTT will reduce this bias so that American goods are treated the same as those from other countries.

10. Could the BTT lead to retaliation by U.S. trading partners?

The BTT is compatible with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Retaliation would be illegal under international trade agreements. The only legal retaliation would be for countries to raise their VAT, which hardly seems likely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Florida is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

NICARAGUA'S DIRTY LITTLE WAR IN NORTH AMERICA

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, this week the Nation's attention has turned south as first the House and then the Senate vote on the President's request for vital aid to the Contras. If any of my colleagues are still undecided and are looking for a solid reason to vote one way or another, let me say that I believe you need look no further than our schoolyards and our playgrounds to see the threat of Nicaragua's dirty little war in North America.

I will grant you that it is not a conventional war. There are no Kalishnikovs, no attack helicopters, no tanks. No, this war is more subtle. But it is no less threatening to our way of life. This war is being fought with a deadly little white powder called cocaine. The left may laugh and make jokes about the "Red tide" threatening San Diego. But let me tell you that I don't consider the mass murderers who traffic in cocaine a laughing matter.

These are very serious allegations, and I am prepared to back them up. In mid-July 1985, a Federal grand jury in Miami, FL, indicted 11 people including an aide to Interior Minister Thomas Borge on cocaine smuggling charges. According to the indictment the aide, Frederico Vaughn, actively assisted Colombian smugglers in their efforts to ship 1,500 kilos of cocaine to the United States.

In August 1984 I held a hearing in the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse to look into the Narco-terrorist link. Having seen the indictment of Vaughn in Miami, I put the following question to William Von Raab, Commissioner of the U.S. Customs Service:

Senator HAWKINS. During the past few weeks there have been numerous reports of direct involvement by senior members of the Nicaraguan Government in narcotics trafficking. I have the indictment that was filed in my hand. Consistent with your responsibility to protect intelligence sources and methods and pending investigations, do you personally believe that senior members of that Government are engaged in narcotics trafficking?

Commissioner VON RAAB. Yes, I do.

Later in that hearing we received testimony from Antonio Farach, former minister counselor at the Nicaraguan Embassies in Venezuela and Honduras. During the course of his testimony Mr. Farach explained his willingness to come before the subcommittee saying, "it is to the youth of the United States, and only for them, that I am here today." Why did he say this? Because after learning of the involvement of high-ranking Nicaraguan officials in narcotics trafficking, he asked why they were doing it and was told:

Our youth would not be harmed, but rather the youth of the United States, the youth of our enemies. Therefore, the drugs were used as a political weapon because in that way we were delivering a blow to our principal enemy.

Some questioned Farach's testimony so I decided to search out an unimpeachable source. On April 19, 1985, in the Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs, and Alcoholism, I conducted another hearing into this sordid business. The star witness was James Herring. Mr. Herring was the key witness in the Miami indictments that involved Frederico Vaughn, aide to Tomas Borge.

Is Mr. Herring a reliable authority? If not, eight people are in jail who should not be. It was primarily on the basis of Mr. Herring's testimony that eight people were convicted on drug trafficking charges. Mr. Herring had been hired by Robert Vesco to assist the Nicaraguan Government launch its cocaine processing operation. He worked on a regular basis with Frederico Vaughn. What did he think was the role of the Nicaraguan Government based on his extensive contacts with Nicaraguan officials and his visits to Nicaragua and Cuba? I put that question to him directly:

Senator HAWKINS. Do you believe that the cocaine trafficking operation was a Government initiative or the action of a few corrupt individuals in Nicaragua?

Mr. HERRING. I think it was a Government-initiated thing; I think it was to gain dollars for the economy of Nicaragua.

In addition, there was testimony from John Keeney, Deputy Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice that there is an eyewitness to the fact that narco-profits from the Nicaraguan drug dealers were returned to Nicaragua by Nicaraguan diplomatic personnel.

Finally, I would like to make mention of important information that has been provided by Alvaro Jose Baldizon Aviles, former chief investigator of the Special Investigations Commission of the Nicaraguan Ministry of the Interior. Baldizon has recently defected to the United States.

In mid-1984, Baldizon's office received a report linking Tomas Borge with cocaine trafficking to the United States. Borge's office instructed Baldizon to investigate this as a compromise of a state secret. After raising this issue with his superiors, Baldizon was told that if he received any further information on cocaine trafficking in the future, it should be passed to the Minister without investigation.

I for one am grateful to the DEA, the Customs Service and the Department of Justice for their vigilance in uncovering this plot. It is to be hoped that by going public with this information over the last few years we can show the drug traffickers that we are alert to attempts to use Nicaragua as a processing and shipment center. But we cannot be certain that we have, in fact, discouraged the Nicaraguans.

The evidence is that high ranking Nicaraguan officials probably with full government support have systematically tried to build a network for trafficking cocaine into this country. With such a concerted effort, I do not believe we can assume that once caught they will back off.

Most of the leaders of the Nicaraguan Government are self-confessed Marxists. I believe that they are out to undermine and destroy our way of life in any way they can—even through drug trafficking. I believe they are committed to continuing their dirty little war in Central America, and I hope we have the sense to do something about it.

GORBACHEV "CONCESSION" ON STAR WARS WILL NOT ADVANCE ARMS CONTROL IN EUROPE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a report from Moscow that appeared in the New York Times on February 8 asserted that the Soviet Union has moved closer to agreement on nuclear arms control in Europe. The Soviet Union has changed its position. The Soviet Union will now negotiate for a reduction of intermediate nuclear missiles in Europe without insisting that the United States abandon its star wars or SDI project. Does this mean that the superpowers will now promptly go forward to agree on a reduction of intermediate nuclear arms on both sides in Europe? No. Such an agreement is now possible. It is still unlikely.

The main significance of the Gorbachev decision to make such an agreement while the United States proceeds to advance star wars suggests that Gorbachev is not really concerned about a U.S. missile defense. In the judgment of this Senator, Gorbachev never has been concerned about star wars. Gorbachev had previously indicated that continued laboratory research on star wars by the United States was not an obstacle to negotiation. The Russian leader continues to insist that he will not agree to any new strategic—that is intercontinental—arms control limitation or reduction if the United States proceeds with SDI.

This Senator has long argued that the Soviet Union fully understands, as virtually every informed and independent American knows, that star wars almost certainly will not work. Why has the Soviet Union so strongly protested the program if they do not regard it as a serious threat? Answer: Gorbachev knows that the one way he can most surely persuade the Congress to go along with the President and divert military funds into this hopeless program is for Gorbachev himself to protest it. If any Member of Congress doubts that star wars will reduce other military programs, including vital and highly relevant research, he should see a speech recently delivered by this Senator on the floor of the Senate documenting exactly this. The more vigorously the Soviets protest star wars, the more Members of the Congress will support it.

Why then does Gorbachev now indicate that star wars progress by the United States will not keep the Soviets from agreeing to a treaty on intermediate nuclear weapons in Europe? The Soviet leader understands that the star wars defense is strictly a potential and very likely impossible U.S. defense. It has no possible application to Europe. A missile flight from the Soviet Union to the United States or vice versa would take 20 minutes to half an hour. It would reach an apogee of several hundred miles above the Earth. Theoretically, an SDI defense could intercept some of such missiles at some point during their long flight. But how about an attack from an advanced Warsaw Pact base in West Germany, Paris, Rome, or even London. The time of missile flight is short. The distances are short. A cruise missile hugging the ground could penetrate any star wars defense. Star wars offers absolutely no credible defense for Europe so, obviously, star wars is totally irrelevant to any agreement on intermediate nuclear missiles. Gorbachev not only knows this. He knows that even many Members of the U.S. Congress understand it. So he appreciates the fact that any insistence on his part that intermediate missile negotiations could not proceed if star wars continues is irrelevant and is recognized by everyone as irrelevant.

Why doesn't this Gorbachev agreement to drop the star wars objection to intermediate missile negotiations indicate the probable success of such negotiations? Answer: When Secretary Gorbachev announced he was dropping the star wars objections, he also announced that he will insist that France and England agree not to increase their intermediate nuclear arsenals. It is true that this does constitute a very slight advance over the previous Soviet posture. In the past, the Soviets had insisted that French and United Kingdom nuclear missiles had to be included with United States intermediate nuclear missiles deployed in Europe in any agreed reduction. Now the Soviets are only asking that neither France nor England increase the present size of their arsenal. If that sounds like a reasonable expectation, it is not. Why won't England and France meet this condition? Answer: As Secretary Gorbachev certainly knows, both France and England have already commenced a major expansion of their nuclear arsenals. Each of these two European countries has announced plans for at least a 1,000 nuclear warhead force. Production of the submarines and bombers to deliver these additional nuclear weapons is well underway. The U.S. position that it cannot and will not negotiate for other sovereign countries is correct. We cannot. Neither the United Kingdom nor France seem inclined to limit their planned new nuclear deployment. So the Gorbachev decision that U.S. star wars progress will not prevent him from reaching an agreement with the United States on superpower deployment of intermediate nuclear missiles will make Gorbachev's position less unreasonable and that is about all it does. It does not signal success for an arms control agreement to limit or reduce superpower nuclear weapons in Europe.

MYTH OF THE DAY: MEDICARE BENEFICIARIES CAN PRICE SHOP FOR MEDICAL CARE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that most Medicare beneficiaries are in a position to effectively price-shop for nonemergency physician care.

One of the goals of this administration—which I strongly support—is to introduce competition into the marketplace for nonemergency care. But a central tenet of effective competition is an explicitly defined price to the consumer. And for most beneficiaries, it is necessary to be clairvoyant if they are to accurately project their potential out-of-pocket costs from different providers for the same service.

For some beneficiaries, this problem has been eased by the development of Medicare reimbursement to Health Maintenance Organizations [HMO's]. With HMO's the possibility of effective price-shopping is becoming a reality: beneficiaries can evaluate competing HMO benefit packages, their maximum out-of-pocket costs under each plan, whether their preferred physician participates and the general reputation for quality of each HMO. Hardly a foolproof system. But a major improvement over the situation which most beneficiaries face in attempting to limit their out-of-pocket costs and shop prudently for medical care.

And with the tremendous reductions which Medicare has been forced to make in the last 5 years, the need of beneficiaries to restrain their out-of-pocket costs has become even more pressing.

But how are beneficiaries who cannot or do not want to join HMO's supposed to price-shop for physician services? Even when they want to price-shop, or desperately need to do so, it is virtually impossible to do so.

The reason lies in Medicare's incredibly complex formula for part B reimbursement. Known as customary, prevailing and reasonable [CPR], Medicare's formula is a bewildering array of formulas that make it impossible for the beneficiary, and often for the physician, to have any idea what Medicare will pay on the physician's bill. Thus, even when a physician is willing, and they often are, to assist those in need, by charging the beneficiary no more than their 20-percent copayment, it is often impossible for a physician to even let the beneficiary know in advance what that 20-percent copayment translates to in dollars.

The complexity derives from the fact that Medicare pays the lowest of: the physician's actual charge for the service the customary charge of the physician for the same service based on billings to Medicare from the prior year or the prevailing charge—a figure set at the 75th percentile of charges of all physicians in the area for the same service—and to complicate matters even further increases in the prevailing charge may not increase more from year to year than increases in the Medicare economic index.

All of this means that unless the physician can remember what Medicare is paying this year for a specific service, the beneficiary has no hope in evaluating the relationship between the bill they receive and what Medicare might pay.

But that's not the end of the story. The next question is whether the physician agrees to accept assignment, meaning that the beneficiary is responsible only for the required 20-percent copayment of Medicare's approved charge; if the physician refuses assignment, the beneficiary faces the 20-percent copayment as well as the difference between the actual charge and Medicare's approved amount—and, in 1985, that difference was 26.2 percent.

And last, but not least, is the question of whether the beneficiary has met the required $75 deductible in the year before Medicare pays a dime. Hardly a reassuring scenario by which the elderly can price-shop.

Consider the points made by the Office of Technology Assessment report:

> Some physicians may not be able to recall their Medicare approved charges when they recommend to the patient that a specific service be rendered, and when they refer a patient to another physician for a specialized service, they may not know all of the services that that physician may render, much less the charges for those services.
> For some infrequently performed procedures rendered near the beginning of a fee screen year, an approved charge for the procedure may not have been calculated for the physician practice. Neither the beneficiary nor the physician would then know the level of the approved charge until a bill for the service had been submitted.
> At the beginning of a fee screen year a physician would be likely to learn of that year's allowed charges only as reimbursements were received for services rendered in the new fee screen year. A physician could request information on those new approved charges . . . but there was no organized information dissemination . . . to physicians.

With such a bewildering structure, can there be any surprise at former HCFA Administrator, Dr. Carolyne Davis' statement that:

> We get something like 9 million letters a year on reimbursement, most simply wanting to know how the payment was arrived at.

The bottom line is clear. As Congress considers revision in Medicare's payment system, we need simplicity. An explicit payment schedule that can be understood by both the beneficiary and the physician in advance. Only then can competition truly flourish. And only then will beneficiaries be in a position to protect themselves from high out-of-pocket costs.

MEETING THE NICARAGUA PROBLEM

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, there is a great deal of concern—I am certainly including myself with those who have great concern—about the trend of things, and the possible developments in Nicaragua.

So I want to make use of about 10 minutes to sum up and review this situation in part, and put my thoughts for whatever they may be worth before my fellow Members.

The only basis I have to make a speech on this subject is some of the background, happenings, and so forth in the time since I have been here. I will not take over about 10 minutes.

Soon after the end of World War II, we assumed a major international leadership role, where prior thereto we had been leaning toward isolationism. Our leaders and our people knew this policy, knew the position, and knew that it would be expensive when we went into it. But, nevertheless, we deliberately took over the responsibility.

As the leader of the free world, we started paying a heavy price, a very heavy price, for that role shortly thereafter because within just a few years we were fully committed in the Korean war, which cost us heavily in manpower and in money. Thus, we had fought our first undeclared war.

I remember so well standing just to the rear of where I am now sitting when I fully realized that we had actually sent troops into Korea, they were engaged then in battle, and we had not passed a resolution of declaration of war which the Constitution plainly and clearly says that Congress shall have the power to declare.

Within a few years, we were fully committed, as I said, in the Korean situation—the first time we fought deliberately an undeclared war. A few years later, we became involved in the war in Vietnam—again an undeclared war—which also cost us severely in lives and money. We have since then been involved in Lebanon, Grenada, and in one way or another in many other countries around the world. Our commitment throughout the world requires us to maintain a military program now costing us over $300 billion a year, three times the amount it cost to run our entire Government only 25 years ago.

I recite those facts as a background for the opportunity I have had to observe and partly get the feel of, and these conditions have influenced me in my conclusion about Nicaragua and a relatively small sum of money, in a measure that the President has asked us to authorize to spend there. It is a lot of money in my book. But when it comes to dealing with these international affairs that I have related, it certainly is not an extravagant figure.

We have had Castro, also, and his regime in Cuba on our very doorsteps for over 20 years in a threatening, unfriendly, and positively closely aligned way with the Soviet Union. Now we have the present regime in Nicaragua closely connected and supported with weapons from the Soviet Union and from Cuba with a clear and present danger that their system and the threat it represents will spread to other Central American countries. That doubly underscores and multiplies many times over my concerns. It is not just Nicaragua, but also these other countries are tied in with all of Central America. The Lord only knows what else could become involved.

We have had a lot of problems. We met them the best we could. We have been successful in part. I do not know where the world would be by now if it had not been for our effort. And the real point we come to now is, What will happen if we do not continue this relatively small program that we have now in Nicaragua—hoping against hope that it will lead to something better and hold things together, and thereby pave the way for the saving of that area?

Promises of negotiation have not been met. I cite these facts to show we already have these problems and trouble spots. We cannot avoid them now by merely withdrawing, because they will not go away. I think our people want a strong, firm foreign policy. They fully understand that there is risk involved. Not only of money, but they understand that it will cost far more in resources and risks to our national security if we have a soft foreign policy, and are unprepared to deal with the situations that may arise. The problems confronting us in Nicaragua will not go away of their own accord. Instead, those problems will grow and fester if left alone. We cannot afford to leave it alone.

With the foregoing facts confronting us, we are compelled to intervene by providing some funds for assistance to the Contras opposing the regime in Nicaragua. The area surrounding Nicaragua could be the seedbed for future trouble if we do not act now.

I repeat that for emphasis. If we do not provide money to help the Contras now, some of these countries are highly vulnerable and run the risk of being undermined in time by the same type Marxist philosophy now present in Nicaragua. This money is not what is known as economic development aid. This money is in reality military funds, a distribution to the Contras to carry on in the fight against Communists in Nicaragua. The only request to us now is for $100 million to be used by the Contras as outlined by the President.

This plan is awkward, in a way, for Nicaragua, and also the other neighboring countries. But it carries the hope and a potential for freedom and democratic institutions in which all countries in the area will eventually share.

This limited involvement now aids the chances for a successful ending of this threat. We need to prevent developments in the area that are adverse to the interests of the local countries, and also definitely a threat to our country.

I am convinced, Mr. President, that we should act in this limited way, and I am further convinced that our Secretary of State, Mr. Shultz, understands this problem, and will do an excellent job.

Mr. President, Secretary Shultz has proved his understanding, his know-how, and his knowledge. He is a planner. He knows, in these uncertain times, in these treacherous times, how to proceed.

This is his recommendation and it is a recommendation of the President of the United States that these funds be supplied. It is unthinkable that we withhold this money now and walk away after having started the course. If we do not proceed now, we shall pay a much greater price later, so let us move forward with this plan.

Mr. President, I have outlined the substance in a brief way, of my background of experience in these crises.

Mr. President, they are moving toward us every day, closer and closer and closer. Now, and this sounds like it is way off, but it is within close distance with modern travel by air.

Mr. President, we must meet these conditions now. We must not slacken, we must not back up; we have started on this course and I hope we can move right on and approve this relatively small amount. Let them know that we are going to be willing to pay the necessary price, and that we are not going to yield.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I thank those who have arranged for our speaking during this period of time. I yield the floor and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SPECTER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] is recognized.

IMPACT OF PROPOSED BUDGET CUTS ON PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I report today on a series of hearings which I held throughout Pennsylvania to investigate the impact that the administration's proposed budget cuts may have. The information that I received has been very informative and will be helpful to me in determining my budget priorities as a series of votes will come before the Senate. There is a great concern throughout my State on what the budget revisions will mean. There is a general understanding that the deficit must be reduced and eventually eliminated. However, cuts in programs should be fair and evenly distributed. This principle is not evident in the proposed budget.

Any budget proposal should take into account the special circumstances of States which have special needs, and that involves a State like Pennsylvania, which, regrettably, has not shared in the economic recovery. Certain regions of the State continue to suffer from levels of high unemployment, and subsequent loss of tax base. I cannot support the proposed budget provisions that will impose undue hardships on Pennsylvanians and hinder my State's ability to continue the economic gains that are being made.

I suggest, Mr. President, that the situation is not unique for Pennsylvania but is duplicated in many other areas of the United States. So there will have to be careful targeting as we work through the process of cutting the deficit, but still give appropriate care and attention to areas of need in this Nation.

At my hearings, many concerned Pennsylvanians testified on matters regarding education, mass transit, veterans' affairs, job programs, job corps, transportation, UDAG's health and human services, general revenue sharing, housing, small business, juvenile justice, and environment. I was very much impressed with their breadth of knowledge and their commitment to efficient, high quality public service. I came away convinced that the budget cuts which were discussed would have to be very carefully tailored so that the needs of areas of our Nation like my own State will be met.

City officials testified that they were quite disturbed by the proposed budget cuts in programs such as urban mass transit, urban development action grants, where the UDAG's have been leveraged for very fine city improvements which have yielded a strong tax base and have yielded more in taxes and revenues to the Federal Government than the initial expenditures; much concern about the Economic Development Administration, which again has a record for a positive yield on the investment and the Federal outlays; great concern about urban mass transit, where the elimination on a drastic basis of Federal support would result in extraordinarily high increases at the fare box, would discourage people from using mass transit, and would undercut the ability of many, simply stated, to be able to get to work. Concern was also expressed at the cuts in housing rehabilitation and development programs, general revenue sharing and job programs. These are some of the programs that are essential to a successful rebuilding of our urban centers, where millions of Americans, including many of our less fortunate low-income, unemployed, and older adults live. Other witnesses testified on particular subject areas which I will briefly describe.

EDUCATION

Educators were very much concerned with the inevitable loss of equal access to educational opportunity given the proposed changes to Pell grants, national defense student loans, and guaranteed student loans. According to these sources, decreases in such aid would compel a good portion of students currently attending colleges to forfeit or delay their education.

They also stressed that these proposed cuts will in fact act to deny students the right to attend the college of their choice. The cuts will result in the selection of a college being based on financial, rather than academic criteria. They testified that many students and their families find themselves unable to meet the rising costs of education without outside assistance. The elimination/reduction in the aforementioned programs would leave thousands of students faced with a very difficult situation: That is, that there would simply be no other sources from which to acquire funds for education. As one person stated, "If you think education is expensive, try ignorance."

It is very important, as we assess the Federal budget on education, that we bear in mind that education is realistically viewed as a capital asset, and that the investment in the future of scholarship is a great thing for America. It is an expenditure which has to be made if we are to keep pace with the Soviets and other great world powers and if we are to keep pace with the modern industrial nations like West Germany, Japan, and other evolving nations.

MASS TRANSIT

The testimony from mass transit officials pointed to the fact that, if operating subsidies are eliminated, there will be dramatic cutbacks in service and unavoidable fare increases. Many mass transit users are poor and elderly, and they would suffer the most from these increased charges. Reductions in capital funding, along with proposed mixing of highway and mass transit block grants, will mean the eventual decay of critical infrastructure that has taken so long to build. Elimination of the gas tax exemption for bus fuel would also impair transit authorities' ability to provide affordable service.

Amtrak officials testified that Amtrak would simply have to shut down if the administration's proposed cuts in subsidies are adopted. Amtrak contributed hundreds of millions of dollars to the economy last year through the purchase of goods and services and its payroll. Amtrak also described the dismal situation the transportation industry and the Nation would face if Amtrak were terminated: Increased air and highway congestion, other transportation inconveniences, and a loss of some 25,000 jobs.

VETERANS

Great concern was shown, Mr. President, from veterans who came to my hearings all across Pennsylvania. They were especially concerned about reductions in medical care, medical treatment.

Witnesses testifying on behalf of Pennsylvania veterans stated that the budget proposals will cause a decline in all aspects of VA programs and services. They charge that cuts are being made without regard to past efficiencies and cost cutting which reportedly have generated over $2 billion in savings over the past 5 years.

With respect to the veterans' issue, it has to be remembered that, unlike many grants or gifts which the Federal Government undertakes, the commitments to the Nation's veterans are obligations which are undertaken for services performed.

JOBS PROGRAMS

The Pittsburgh Job Corps Director testified that, if the administration's proposals are accepted, $5 million would be lost to the local economy. In addition, the opportunity to break the cycle of welfare, one of the President's stated goals, would be eliminated for the 1,000 local youths who participate every year. He questioned the budget's logic given administration's studies, and numerous independent studies which reportedly prove conclusively that there is a return on investment of $1.46 for every dollar invested in the Job Corps. He testified that the President's budget entails 38 to 64 center closings, 32,000 fewer new enrollees, and 6,200 lost staff jobs nationwide.

JUSTICE

Juvenile Justice, Justice Assistant, and Victim Assistance Programs would be critically injured by budget proposals. These programs have shined in their success until now and we should not allow them to be eliminated. To do so would serve only to negate much of the progress already achieved. Their importance to my State was stressed in testimony.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

The firm consensus of all those who testified on behalf of the Small Business Administration [SBA] was that the SBA has exerted a tremendously positive influence, providing much needed financial and management assistance to small businesses. The SBA assistance programs have greatly enhanced the ability of small businesses to compete effectively in the marketplace, and thereby continue to provide valuable and essential services. Elimination of the SBA and its programs would seriously curtail the growth of small businesses as a positive force in our economy, reduce the competitive nature of our business sector, and raise unemployment.

ENVIRONMENT

Representatives of the Sierra Club expressed great concern over the adverse consequences that would result from the cuts in environmental programs. Testimony stated that Pennsylvania stands to lose over $640 million in 1987 (a good portion of which would come from elimination of grants for construction of sewage treatment plants). The continuation of the preservation and cleanup of Pennsylvania's rivers and streams is of critical importance. As such, all testimony stressed that we can ill afford to allow the tremendous progress made in environmental protection to be reversed or negated.

HOUSING/UDAGS/CDBG/EDA

City officials across the State testified as to the devastating effects that proposed reduction and/or elimination of UDAG's, CDBG's, housing programs, and economic development would have on their cities and surrounding areas. All who testified reiterated their support for and understanding of the need to reduce Federal spending and eventually eliminate the deficit. However, they expressed deep concern over the indiscriminate manner in which the proposed budget cuts appear to have been made. The recurrent theme of each person who testified was that the loss of Federal funds will create great havoc and place a tremendous burden on local municipalities who cannot replace those funds through increased tax revenue. The end result—dramatic curtailments and cutbacks in essential services, programs, and employment.

Officials substantiated their arguments for the continuation of UDAG's/CDBG's in describing dozens of examples where these grants were the pivotal leveraging mechanism for financing such varied projects as housing development/rehabilitation, urban revitalization, commercial development, public safety, and street improvements.

HHS

Officials testifying for agencies who provide health and human services programs described an equally dismal situation should proposed cuts in their funding be enacted. Given previous reductions in funding levels for many HHS areas, the additional proposed cuts would force agencies to make extremely difficult decisions in determining the priorities for the distribution of their scarce resources. Affected programs include nutritional service, employment and training, education, health, housing, and other vital programs.

For example, a study conducted by the Urban Institute here in Washington concluded that Allegheny County is one of the most heavily dependent upon Federal assistance for social services. Of the nearly $1.5 billion spent annually in Allegheny County for these services, 77 percent comes from the Federal Government. Should the county lose those funds, the immense impact of the loss becomes painfully clear. These cuts are especially difficult for an area which has experienced such a dramatic loss of manufacturing jobs and tax base.

In summation, Mr. President, I have acquired valuable information from and insight into the concerns of Pennsylvanians regarding the fiscal year 1987 budget. When the 1981 tax and budget cuts were enacted, one major premise was that, as the Federal Government reduced grants for social service, State and local governments would step in to fill the gap. In the case of Pennsylvania, that apparently cannot happen. Given this, it is clear that, while the Federal Government continues to shift the financial burden to the State and local levels, those governments find themselves without sufficient financial resources to address many of the problems which were originally conceived as being national goals and objectives. Therefore, as we in Congress continue to strive toward our goal of eliminating the Federal deficit, we must remember that we have a duty to tailor the Federal budget to the real needs of the country, and to the diverse circumstances of the States. I will be working vigorously to assure that this is accomplished.

Mr. President, I have attached a list of the witnesses who testified and where these hearings were held, and I ask unanimous consent that it be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL DEBT RECOVERY ACT

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to the consideration of Calendar No. 554, S. 209, the Federal Debt Recovery Act, and that it be considered under the following agreement: That no amendments be in order with the exception of the committee-reported amendments; that no motions to recommit with instructions be in order; 2 minutes on any debatable motions, appeals, or points of order, if so submitted to the Senate; that the vote on final passage of S. 209 occur at 11:30 a.m.; and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 209) to amend chapter 37 of title XXXI, United States Code, to authorize contracts retaining private counsel to furnish collection services in the case of indebtedness owed the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs, with amendments, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Debt Recovery Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 3718 of title 31, United States Code, is amended—

[(4)] (3) in subsection (e), as redesignated by paragraph [(2), (1)—]

(A) by inserting "or (b)" after "(a)" in the first sentence; and

If the Attorney General makes a contract for legal services to be furnished in any judicial district of the United States under the first sentence, the Attorney General shall use his best efforts to retain, from among attorneys regularly engaged in the private practice of law in such district, more than one private counsel to furnish such legal services in such district. Each such contract shall include such terms and conditions as the Attorney General considers necessary and appropriate, including a provision specifying the amount of the fee to be paid to the private counsel under such contract or the method for calculating that fee. The amount of the fee payable for legal services furnished under any such contract may not exceed the fee that counsel engaged in the private practice of law in the area or areas where the legal services are furnished typically charge clients for furnishing legal services in the collection of claims of indebtedness, as determined by the Attorney General, considering the amount, age, and nature of the indebtedness and whether the debtor is an individual or a business entity.

"(5) Notwithstanding the fourth sentence of section 803(6) of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (15 U.S.C. 1692a(6)), a private counsel performing legal services pursuant to a contract made under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be considered a debt collector for the purposes of such Act.

"(c)(1) The Attorney General shall transmit to the Congress an annual report on the activities of the Department of Justice to recover indebtedness owed the United States which was referred to the Department of Justice or to a private counsel for collection. "(B) After completing each audit under subparagraph (A), the Comptroller General shall transmit to the Congress a report on the findings and conclusions resulting from the audit.".

SEC. 3. Not later than [sixty] 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Attorney General of the United States shall transmit to the Congress a report on the actions taken under section 3718(b) of title 31, United States Code (as added by paragraph [5] (4) of section 2 of this Act).

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I am very pleased that the Senate is today considering the Federal Debt Recovery Act. Our subcommittee of the Governmental Affairs Committee conducted hearings on the bill at the request of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. D'AMATO]. After considering the testimony and the proposal the subcommittee had made for reporting the bill, the committee did report the bill and is recommending to the Senate today that it enact this bill and send it to the House.

I commend the distinguished Senator from New York for his leadership in developing this legislation and in assisting to bring it before the Senate.

This legislation provides authority for the Federal Government to employ private attorneys to assist in the collection of delinquent debts that are owed to the Federal Government.

For some time, private collection agencies have been employed by the Government to assist in collecting these debts, but there has been an absence of authority to use private attorneys. The Department of Justice has been the sole legal counsel and litigant authorized to proceed against those who owe the Government money and will not pay it. So any judgments obtained against individuals who owe the Government money have been obtained through the use of U.S. attorneys throughout the country.

The workload has become immense. The number of outstanding debts that are not being collected because of the failure to be able to employ private counsel have risen dramatically over the years. It is important that we pass this legislation and that we provide this additional authority to employ private counsel.

Mr. President, at this time I yield to the distinguished Senator from New York such time as he may consume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], for his aid in making it possible for us to consider S. 209 today. His counsel, June Walton, and the staff director, James Lofton, have been of invaluable assistance with respect to this legislation.

Mr. President, I am pleased to rise today to support passage of S. 209, the Federal Debt Recovery Act of 1985. This bill will assist the Federal Government in recovering hundreds of millions of dollars in delinquent nontax debts that currently go uncollected. S. 209 is virtually identical to S. 1668 which passed the Senate on July 25, 1984, by a vote of 96 to 1.

S. 209 has been reported unanimously by the Governmental Affairs Committee. It was a subject of hearings by the Energy, Nuclear Proliferation, and Government Processes Subcommittee on September 26, 1985. I want to thank Chairman COCHRAN and the subcommittee staff, especially Chief Counsel June Walton, and the staff director, James Lofton, for all the help they have provided in getting this important legislation to the floor at this time.

The bill before us today will permit the Attorney General to contract with private attorneys to furnish legal services in connection with the recovery of nontax indebtedness owed the United States. It will enable the Federal Government to begin the process of recovering billions of dollars in nontax delinquent debt in a timely, systematic, and fair manner. No appropriations are required for this bill because attorneys will be compensated only from the proceeds collected. As I speak, there is more than $24 billion worth of overdue delinquent nontax debt outstanding.

A companion bill, H.R. 979, has been introduced by Congressman JIM MOODY. Hearings will be held in the House Judiciary Committee in the near future. I am confident that my House colleagues will be encouraged by today's Senate action to press for swift consideration and passage of this vital legislation. Each day, delinquent nontax debts cost the Federal Government $15.37 million due to lost interest, increased Government borrowing costs, and debts lost to the statute of limitations. We cannot afford to permit these funds to continue to go uncollected. The 99th Congress has the duty to achieve deficit reduction wherever possible. This legislation is a clear opportunity to carry out that responsibility.

I have worked on this legislation for more than 3 years. In 1983, when I introduced previous bills on this subject with former Senator Percy, the amount of nontax delinquencies was $16 billion. When I introduced S. 209 in the 99th Congress, the amount of nontax delinquencies had grown to $19.9 billion—an increase of 24 percent. At the end of fiscal year 1985, that amount had soared to $23.9 billion—an increase of another 20 percent. Clearly, the problem is getting worse at a time when deficit reduction goals are forcing us to make hard choices about funding levels for various federally aided programs.

The most significant benefit of this bill is that it will bring desperately needed dollars back into the Treasury; however, a beneficial byproduct is that it will help restore the integrity of many Federal loan programs that have lost support in large part due to the Federal Government's inability to manage its debt. Failure to implement professional debt-management procedures has led to a proliferation of seriously delinquent debts. There is now at least $14.9 billion in nontax delinquencies that are more than 1 year overdue—an increase of 21 percent from fiscal year 1984. I think it is a shame that we end up cutting dollars from worthwhile programs in the name of deficit reduction when, with better credit management, the funds would be there to fund the programs.

Mr. President, many of the figures I have cited are summarized in two simple tables my staff has prepared. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that they be printed in the RECORD in their entirety at this point.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, for years, Federal agencies have continued to make billions of dollars available in loans under a myriad of different programs. Until very recently, however, there has not been a corresponding effort to assure that debts are repaid on time. The Debt Collection Act of 1982 was a significant beginning in the Federal Government's effort to gain control of its burgeoning collection problems. As a result of that act and subsequent program initiatives, the Federal Government is starting to implement modern tools of credit management, such as automated tracking of accounts, sharing of information regarding debtors among Federal agencies, and the use of collection agencies.

In 1984, the enactment of the Deficit Reduction Act allowed the Internal Revenue Service to offset delinquent debts against income tax refunds otherwise due to taxpayers. Under that act, debtors must be given 60 days notice prior to such an offset and must be allowed to bring their accounts into current status, establish payment schedules, or pay in full prior to the effective date. As of December 1985, $14.8 million has been collected through voluntary payments as a result of offset notices sent to taxpayers. The IRS will be able to continue this practice through 1986. I commend this administration for committing itself to bringing 20th century techniques into our debt collection efforts. The retention of private attorneys, as provided for in S. 209, however, is the next logical step in good credit management.

Many debtors with the financial ability to repay their debts have steadfastly refused to pay them; they have learned that debts owed to the Federal Government are unlikely to be pursued, reduced to judgments, and enforced. Unfortunately, they are right. Many of these debtors have proven to be affluent professionals.

The Justice Department is ill-equipped to handle the massive volume of delinquent tax debts ($35.3 billion), let alone the delinquent nontax debts ($23.9 billion). DOJ has higher priorities, such as fighting organized crime, drug trafficking, extortion, and other serious felonies.

As of July 31, 1985, there were 92,978 delinquent debt cases pending at DOJ, as well as 210,557 other cases and matters. Of the debt collection cases, 18 percent were over 4 years old; in many of them, no action had yet been instituted. Even in those cases where judgments were secured, often the critical step of enforcement action was not taken to actually collect moneys owed to the Treasury.

At the close of fiscal year 1985, there were 6,937,757 delinquent nontax debts. At the same time, there were 158,285 overdue accounts pending at DOJ, independent of the tens of thousands of other criminal and civil cases and other matters also pending there. A total of less than 75,000 lawsuits of any nature, in which the Federal Government was the party plaintiff, were brought by DOJ during 1985. Even if all of the 75,000 lawsuits were collection cases, which they were not, the cases would represent less than 2 percent of the delinquent debts owed the Federal Government. The point is clear: The sheer volume of delinquent accounts overwhelms the resources of DOJ. For example, as of July 31, 1985, DOJ had terminated only 4,390 debt-collection cases. At the same time, there were another 25,344 cases referred by Education Department pending at DOJ.

As a result of the immensity of the task assigned to it, DOJ occasionally publicizes its efforts to pursue delinquent debtors in order to deter others from failing to pay their debts. Such publicity makes a brief splash, but without diligent follow through—securing judgments and, most importantly, enforcing them and collecting the amounts owed—these incidents do not serve the Government well because the debt remains unpaid and debtors may have been subjected to extreme embarrassment and humiliation.

An article illustrating this very point appeared in the March 6 issue of the Washington Post. It tells the story of an employee of a quasi-Government agency who was arrested by U.S. marshals and brought before a U.S. magistrate for failure to repay a student loan of $1,100. The Government had obtained a judgment against this debtor, but after 5 years, was unable to reduce the judgment to payment. Under the Deficit Reduction Act, the wages of the debtor could have been garnished to repay the debt; instead, the Government chose the intrusive option of arresting the debtor. This type of police-state tactics would not be tolerated if practiced by the private bar. In fact, there are severe penalties in Federal laws aimed at those who would abuse consumer debtors. Mr. President, I commend this article to the attention of the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 6, 1986]

U.S. WORKER ARRESTED IN STUDENT LOAN CASE AFTER LONG SEARCH

(By Nancy Lewis)

A 41-year-old Northwest Washington man who for five years eluded the federal government's efforts to collect a $1,100 court judgment against him for an unpaid student loan while at the same time working for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. was arrested yesterday by U.S. marshals.

"When you ignore a contempt of court [summons] . . . you can expect to have U.S. marshals take you into custody and bring you before the court," Assistant U.S. Attorney Royce C. Lamberth said after Ronald A. Sanders of 49 Seaton Place NW was arrested at his home.

U.S. Magistrate Arthur L. Burnett told Sanders that he could have "avoided embarrassment" if he had simply answered the government's inquiries. In the future, Burnett said, "come down here and people will try to help you."

Sanders, who told Burnett that he hadn't received all of the court's summons because of "domestic problems," and simply that the incident had been "humiliating."

The government had been trying for five years to get Sanders to set up a repayment plan for the balance, plus interest, on two loans, totaling $1,700, that he received while attending Central State University in Wilberforce, Ohio.

The order to bring Sanders into court was approved Jan. 22 by U.S. District Judge John Pratt after the government was unable to find out where Sanders worked. Although federal agencies have several programs designed to uncover federal employes who have defaulted on student loans, none apparently turned up Sanders, officials said.

"We do not intend to allow people to ignore their obligation to repay money they owe the United States," Lamberth said. "In this day of federal deficits, the money we can obtain from debt collections, while small in individual cases, is staggering in its total impact on the federal treasury."

Richard Hastings of the Department of Education said that of all federal loan programs, about $5 billion is in default. For guaranteed student loans, made by private financial institutions and backed by the government, the rate of default is about 10 percent, he said.

For direct student loans, the default rate is about 14.5 percent.

As part of its increased efforts, Hastings said, the names of more than 18,000 people who are in default on their loans have been sent to federal prosecutors for collection.

Lamberth said that in the District the government is trying to collect on about 1,000 judgments. The wages of more than 100 federal employes here are being garnished.

Government officials said that they expect Sanders' pay would be garnished if he did not propose a satisfactory repayment schedule.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, the legal process should not be used to frighten debtors into paying their debts. I firmly believe that a systematic approach to debt collection, combined with a meaningful threat of litigation as a last resort, is the best way to collect delinquent debts. Moreover, S. 209 specifically states that the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act applies to attorneys handling debt collection cases for the Federal Government. Thus, attorneys must recognize the basic rights and liberties of consumers while utilizing all available legal collection tools.

I am pleased that DOJ supports my legislation. Over the last several years of work on this bill, DOJ has come to agree with its privatization approach. This idea was recommended by the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control—the Grace Commission.

S. 209 will freeup DOJ attorneys, some of our very best Federal lawyers, for the challenging and important work they were hired to do. It certainly is questionable whether DOJ should have to treat debt collection as one of its top priorities. Certainly, it is important to recover these delinquent debts, but I believe that DOJ attorneys are best employed as crime fighters, not as bill collectors.

Collection agencies are vital to the Government's effort to collect these delinquent debts. However, as noted in a 1983 GAO study, collection agencies efforts are hampered by their inability to threaten debtors with legal suits. Without the added tool of litigation, collection agencies employed by the Education Department have only been able to achieve a collection rate of 6.6 percent. In the private sector, where the threat of litigation is meaningful, the collection rate for similar debts would be as high as 30 percent to 40 percent.

S. 209 is the product of extensive discussion and deliberation with the Justice Department, the Education Department, and many others with expertise in the field of debt collection. It reflects a compromise reached with justice whereby justice was given the power to contract with private law firms for legal services in connection with debt collection. Further, we agreed that the heads of Federal agencies could then, subject to the approval of the Attorney General, refer cases directly to the law firms hired by DOJ.

Federal agencies should not bypass the cost-effective use of collection agencies in recovering delinquent debt. Litigation against recalcitrant debtors is only intended to be used as a tool of last resort. In addition, S. 209 was crafted to permit Federal agencies to have the option to decide whether a contract with a collection agency would give the collection agency the power to make direct referrals to law firms retained by DOJ. Nothing in the bill precludes such contracts from being executed.

In order to safeguard the public interest, the bill authorizes DOJ to recall any claim referred to private counsel. This authority is intended to be reserved for exceptional, rather than routine, cases. DOJ may also terminate contracts with private law firms. S. 209 also states that the heads of Federal agencies shall have the power to resolve disputes regarding claims, compromise claims, or terminate collection action on claims. Private attorneys must also submit periodic status reports, both to the Attorney General and to the head of the Federal agency referring claims under the contract.

The Attorney General is required to submit to Congress an annual report on DOJ's activities to recover delinquent debts. An annual audit of DOJ's actions to retain private counsel under this bill is also required to be performed by the Comptroller General and submitted to Congress. In order to ensure prompt action in implementing the provisions of the bill, the Attorney General must make a report to Congress within 180 days after enactment. The magnitude of the outstanding delinquent debt makes it essential that no more time be lost in recovering these moneys.

It should be clearly understood that S. 209 does not require Congress to appropriate a single penny to implement its provisions. Payments to attorneys retained by DOJ are to be made out of proceeds collected. It is anticipated that DOJ will negotiate contingent fee arrangements with private counsel. The amount of the fee may not exceed the fee that counsel in the same geographic area typically charge clients for debt collection legal services. Factors to be taken into account in determining whether a fee is reasonable include such items as the amount, age, and nature of the indebtedness, and whether the debtor is an individual or a business entity. Contracts may include all terms and conditions deemed necessary by the Attorney General. The bill also requires the Attorney General to use his best efforts to retain more than one private counsel in each judicial district.

Under the careful supervision of DOJ, and subject to provisions which would protect the rights of debtors, the use of private counsel will greatly enhance the ability of the Federal Government to recover outstanding debt. Many individuals owing money to the Federal Government are making a calculated decision not to repay their loans, convinced that the Federal Government has neither the inclination nor the capacity to recover the debt. They have a take-the-money-and-run mentality. This cheats the taxpayer and, in the long run, threatens the viability of many worthwhile Federal programs such as the student financial assistance programs, which are especially important to the lower and middle-class families of this Nation. We must reverse that attitude and send a clear message that we mean business.

This bill will create more efficient, cost-effective debt collection by the Federal Government. It also will help restore the good faith and integrity which should be present in successful debtor-creditor relationships. I am pleased that S. 209 has the support of the DOJ, the Department of Education, and OMB. DOJ's firm support for this bill is evidenced by a similar proposal which it drafted incorporating the essential features of S. 209 with some technical differences.

Mr. President, one should reflect on the fact that while we talk about reducing the Federal deficit, there are billions of dollars in overdue delinquent debts that are owed to the Treasury, to the taxpayers of the United States of America, that for years have gone uncollected. Moreover, they have gone uncollected without justifiable reasons.

It is not a question that the debtors do not have the ability to pay. Oftentimes, we hear the most incredible stories, about people who have borrowed money for a variety of reasons—guaranteed student loans, small business loans, commerce loans, energy loans—and have willfully failed to repay their loans despite the fact that they have enormous incomes. It is simply a matter that they have never been pressed by the Federal Government to repay their obligations after they have borrowed the money.

Many debtors have reached the conclusion that, "If you come to the Federal Government and borrow money, the chances are miniscule that you will ever be required to pay it back. Therefore, simply don't answer the letters that come to you from collection agencies with respect to your delinquent debt, and the chances are pretty good that you will never be sued on your debt by the Federal Government.

Consequently, we have a situation today in which the Federal Government, for fiscal year 1985, is owed, in nontax-delinquent debts—not because of delinquent taxes—$23,907,000,000. The total figure representing overdue nontax debts has been rising each year.

The Federal Government is sending the wrong message to the taxpayers of this country: If you borrow money from Uncle Sam, we are not going to diligently pursue the overdue debt; and, it is very unlikely that we will ever get around to sueing you and enforcing any judgment against you.

The Justice Department simply does not have adequate resources to sue all those who owe delinquent debts, many of whom are in a financial position to repay these moneys. The Guaranteed Student Loan Program is an example: We should be making those moneys available, but we also should assure that they are repaid so that the program will be there to help future generations. The same principle applies to a host of other programs.

It is my hope that this carefully crafted bill will ensure that in the future we will not continue to lose billions of dollars because the statute of limitations has run out on many of these debts. Annually, the statute of limitations tolls on the Federal Government's ability to collect hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money. It is highly unlikely that we will ever be able to collect any of those debts for which the statute of limitation has tolled.

This legislative initiative was passed in the Senate 2 years ago by a vote of 96 to 1. I hope that our colleagues in the House of Representatives will act expeditiously to pass companion legislation. It is about time we got serious about collecting the dollars that are owed to the U.S. taxpayers.

I urge my colleagues to vote for passage of this bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this is an excellent bill. I rise to encourage my colleagues to give it overwhelming, if not unanimous, support. It was considered carefully by the Governmental Affairs Committee, on which I serve.

There was a hearing by the Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation and Government Processes on September 26, 1985. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] chaired that hearing. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] is the ranking minority member of that subcommittee. They did excellent work. There will be virtually unanimous support on this side of the aisle.

Mr. President, I wish to add my commendation to that already expressed by the Senator from New York [Mr. D'AMATO]. He showed remarkable initiative in bringing this legislation forward and in pushing it diligently to the point where it now stands on the verge of overwhelming adoption.

Our country obviously needs revenue, and obviously the first place to get more revenue is from those who already owe it and have not paid it.

Insofar as the traditional methods of collecting those debts have not worked as well as we would like, and insofar as the private sector is capable of and willing to assist us in increasing the amount of revenue from those who owe it, this legislation represents a really good idea. There are some hazards and pitfalls to consider in addressing this subject, but through the hearing process, the Governmental Affairs Committee has addressed all those potential problems.

I am convinced that this legislation is very much in the best interest of the country, and I again commend my colleague, the Senator from New York, for bringing it forward.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 209, the Federal Debt Recovery Act of 1985, which permits the use of private attorneys to collect outstanding debts owed the Federal Government. This bill also contains important safeguards to ensure that, by granting such authority, we do not provide a huge financial windfall to only a handful of private law firms.

I am pleased that the sponsors of S. 209 saw fit to include those safeguarding provisions which I offered, and which the Senate adopted, when this body considered similar legislation in 1984. These provisions will help ensure that the contracts for the services of private attorneys are awarded on a competitive basis, that the fees paid for such services reflect the going rates charged for litigating commercial debt cases, and will require an annual GAO audit to monitor the soundness of the entire program.

I believe these provisions make a good idea even better.

There is no question that we have an enormous problem of defaulted debt to the Federal Government. As of September 30, 1985, $23.6 billion in nontax delinquent debt was owed the Federal Government. This amount is more than double the $11.7 billion in nontax delinquent debts which were reported outstanding in fiscal year 1981.

Although the Debt Collection Act of 1982 permitted the Federal Government to use the services of private debt collection agencies, we have hardly made a dent in this mountain of bad debt.

That is so, Mr. President, for the simple reason that dunning by collection agencies often doesn't work.

After the dunning notices fail to make the debtors pay back the money they owe, the Federal Government must turn to the Justice Department to take these debtors to court. Quite frankly, the Department of Justice has neither the personnel nor the inclination to move aggressively to collect this money.

There were 92,978 delinquent debt cases pending at the Department of Justice as of July 31, 1985, in addition to the 210,557 other civil and criminal cases and other matters. Of these debt collection cases, 18 percent were over 4 years old. These cases were in various stages of action, but, as the Committee on Governmental Affairs noted in its report accompanying S. 209, no legal action had been initiated in many of them.

S. 209 will go a long way in strengthening our ability to collect money owed the Federal treasury by permitting the Justice Department to contract, on a contingency fee basis, with private law firms to litigate some of these bad debt cases.

At the same time, the bill includes the amendments I offered back in 1984 to ensure that contracts are awarded competitively and that the contingency fees paid for such private attorneys are reasonable.

I believe S. 209 is a carefully constructed piece of legislation and I urge its adoption.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] for his support of the legislation which we are now considering. He is an important member of the Governmental Affairs Committee, and we appreciate very much his assistance in bringing this bill to the floor and having it reported favorably by the committee.

I also thank the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] who is the ranking minority member of our subcommittee. It has been a pleasure working with him on the subcommittee which has a wide range of jurisdiction. His assistance in getting the bill to the floor is sincerely appreciated.

I think this bill is going to greatly enhance our efforts to reduce the Federal deficit. When Congress passed the Debt Collection Act of 1982, it indicated its recognition of the importance of improving our credit management system.

That act permitted the Federal Government to charge interest, report delinquent debtors to credit bureaus, and most importantly to utilize private collection agencies to pursue recovery. Another important credit management tool, the Internal Revenue Service's authority to deduct overdue debts from the tax refund checks of debtors, was enacted as part of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

At a time when we are faced with severe budget constraints, it is gratifying to me that we are considering legislation that will not require any additional appropriation of funds but instead will increase revenues without raising taxes by facilitating the collection of debts owed to our Government.

The tools that have been made available in the past have improved our debt collection efforts considerably, but this final step, permitting litigation by attorneys, has not been used often enough nor have postjudgment actions been pursued aggressively in the past.

Currently, agencies are required to refer claims of $600 or more, including debt collection cases, to the Department of Justice for litigation. However, the staff and resources available to U.S attorneys around the country are limited and better utilized in pursuing cases involving important constitutional issues, violent crime, and narcotics trafficking, all of which are very serious problems throughout the country.

As of July 31, 1985, there were 92,978 delinquent debt cases pending with the Department of Justice. These cases were in various stages of litigation or postjudgment action. In many of the cases, no legal action had been taken, or, where judgment had been obtained, no postjudgment enforcement action was being pursued.

Mr. President, the Department of Justice recognizes the need for assistance in reducing the backlog of delinquent debt cases. As part of the administration's antifraud enforcement initiative last year it recommended enactment of legislation similar to S. 209. Senator ROTH and I introduced that bill, S. 1658, by request on September 18.

Additionally, Mr. President, the Office of Management and Budget has reported that, at the beginning of fiscal year 1985, almost $19.9 billion in nontax delinquent debt was owed to the U.S. Government. Over $6.2 billion of that amount was more than 6 years overdue. The lastest OMB figures show that as of September 30, 1985, nontax delinquent debt had grown to $23.6 billion, an increase of $3.7 billion in just 1 year. The enormous growth in the amount of delinquent debt is even more evident when you consider that since fiscal year 1981, when outstanding nontax delinquent debt stood at $11.7 billion, the total has more than doubled.

It is also disturbing that due to the running of the statute of limitations, which cuts off the ability to pursue legal action, our failure to collect on these debts on a timely basis impairs any chance of future recovery. OMB provided statistics for fiscal year 1985 which indicate that $7.5 million is lost each day due to the running of the statute of limitations. Coupled with the increased costs of borrowing and lost interest to the Treasury, total cost to the taxpayer is an estimated $5.61 billion per year.

This bill will enable the Department of Justice to reduce its backlog of pending cases and in a more expeditious way handle hundreds of thousands of potential new cases which have yet to be referred by the agencies to whom debts are owed. The use of private counsel will also enable the Government to pursue litigation in cases under $600, which the Department considers too small to litigate in an effective or efficient way. However, private attorneys have testified that they regularly handle such small dollar claims and profitably collect on them.

This legislation will allow the Government to retain the services of attorneys who have demonstrated competency, experience, and reliability in the handling of collection accounts in the geographical area where the debtor is located. Furthermore, private attorneys specializing in debt litigation have extensive experience with post-judgment remedies and procedures as well as the financial motivation to vigorously pursue collection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allocated to the majority side has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COCHRAN. The unanimous-consent request which was propounded to the Chair included no time agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent agreement provided for a vote at 11:30 a.m., and that the agreement be in the usual form. The agreement in the usual form provides for a division of time between the majority and minority sides.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am happy to yield time to the chairman of the subcommittee from the minority time.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, with enactment of this legislation, collection agencies will be able, where appropriate, to advise debtors that litigation is a likely consequence for the failure to pay. Once debtors are aware that the Government is serious about collecting the money it is owed, they will respond to persuasive collection efforts.

Protections have been built into the legislation to ensure the integrity of the program and enhance competition. The bill requires the Attorney General to use his best efforts to retain more than one counsel in a judicial district where such services will be utilized. The fees established will be reasonable and may not exceed the rate typically charged for a similar service in the area where the private counsel is engaged in practice. The attorneys retained to litigate debt cases under this act will do so on a contingency fee basis. Language in the committee's report directs the Attorney General to use his best efforts to ensure that all interested firms, including small firms and minority firms, will have full opportunity to compete or be considered for these legal service contracts.

Attorneys retained under this authority will be debt contractors under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act and will be subject to its provisions. Furthermore, the committee's report emphasizes that the authority to retain private counsel does not mean that Federal agencies should bypass the use of private collection agencies. Rather, Government agencies should increasingly use all the credit management tools available. Litigation should be used as a final collection tool after other attempts to collect have failed. All collection activity, from start to finish, must be pursued promptly.

Mr. President, the Senate has previously approved the use of private attorneys to assist in the litigation of debt cases. By the overwhelming vote of 96 to 1 the Senate passed S. 1668, a bill similar to S. 209, on July 25, 1984. However, that bill was not acted on by the House prior to adjournment of the 98th Congress.

At a hearing on S. 209 last September 26, our Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation and Government Processes, received testimony from the Department of Justice supporting the legislation. Private attorneys and collection agencies testified that collections would be enhanced with prompt and timely litigation. State government officials described their successful experiences using private attorneys for collection litigation and recommend their use.

Mr. President, an efficient and effective credit management system requires timely litigation and post-judgment enforcement. Enactment of S. 209 will ensure that these tools are fully utilized.

In closing, Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished Senator from New York, who is my good friend, Mr. D'AMATO, the sponsor of S. 209, for his hard work and cooperation in bringing this legislation before the Senate. Anne Miano of his staff was most helpful to my subcommittee staff in preparing for our hearing on the bill.

I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this legislation, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to inform the managers of the bill that there are pending several amendments to the bill. Those amendments have been reported by the committee and a unanimous consent agreement would be necessary that those amendments be considered en bloc.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc and agreed to en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments are agreed to.

The committee amendments were agreed to en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No further amendments are in order. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 11:30 having arrived, the Senate will vote on the bill. The bill, having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. MCCLURE] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] is absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE] is absent because of death in the family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 95, nays 1, as follows:

So the bill (S. 209), as amended, was passed, as follows:

S. 209

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Debt Recovery Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 3718 of title 31, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsections (b), (c), and (d) as subsections (d), (e), and (f), respectively;

(2) in subsection (d), as redesignated by paragraph (1), by inserting "or (b)" after "subsection (a)";

(3) in subsection (e), as redesignated by paragraph (1)—

(A) by inserting "or (b)" after "(a)" in the first sentence; and

(B) by striking out "(b)" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "(d)"; and

(4) by inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsections:

"(b)(1) The Attorney General may make contracts retaining private counsel to furnish legal services, including representation in negotiation, compromise, settlement, and litigation, in the case of any claim of indebtedness owed the United States. If the Attorney General makes a contract for legal services to be furnished in any judicial district of the United States under the first sentence, the Attorney General shall use his best efforts to retain, from among attorneys regularly engaged in the private practice of law in such district, more than one private counsel to furnish such legal services in such district. Each such contract shall include such terms and conditions as the Attorney General considers necessary and appropriate, including a provision specifying the amount of the fee to be paid to the private counsel under such contract or the method for calculating that fee. The amount of the fee payable for legal services furnished under any such contract may not exceed the fee that counsel engaged in the private practice of law in the area or areas where the legal services are furnished typically charge clients for furnishing legal services in the collection of claims of indebtedness, as determined by the Attorney General, considering the amount, age, and nature of the indebtedness and whether the debtor is an individual or a business entity.

"(2) The head of an executive or legislative agency may, subject to the approval of the Attorney General, refer to a private counsel retained under paragraph (1) of this subsection claims of indebtedness owed the United States arising out of activities of that agency.

"(3) Notwithstanding sections 516, 518(b), 519, and 547(2) of title 28, a private counsel retained under paragraph (1) of this subsection may represent the United States in litigation in connection with legal services furnished pursuant to the contract entered into with that counsel under paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(4) A contract made with a private counsel under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall include—

"(A) a provision permitting the Attorney General to terminate the contract if the Attorney General determines that the termination of the contract is for the convenience of the Government;

"(B) a provision permitting the Attorney General to have any claim referred under the contract returned to the Attorney General if the Attorney General finds such action to be in the public interest;

"(C) a provision permitting the head of any executive or legislative agency which refers a claim under the contract to resolve a dispute regarding the claim, to compromise the claim, or to terminate a collection action on the claim; and

"(D) a provision requiring the private counsel to transmit periodically to the Attorney General and the head of the executive or legislative agency referring a claim under the contract a report on the services relating to the claim rendered under the contract during the period for which the report is made and the progress made during such period in collecting the claim under the contract.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

METROPOLITAN WASHINGTON AIRPORTS TRANSFER ACT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me again indicate to my colleagues we are now going to try to get consent to go to the regional airport bill, Calendar No. 424, S. 1017.

I know this is a matter of great importance to a number of Senators. It is going to take a considerable period of discussion. I have discussed this with the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Senator SARBANES, and also with the Senators from Virginia, Senator TRIBLE and Senator WARNER. But I do believe we should move in that direction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of Calendar No. 424, S. 1017, the transfer of Metropolitan Washington airports to an independent Washington authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will object, I simply want to say to the majority leader that I think this is one of those issues which the membership has not focused its attention upon. I feel very keenly about this issue. I believe it needs to be fully discussed and, therefore, I object to the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate turn to the consideration of Calendar No. 424, S. 1017.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I wish to speak to the motion.

Mr. President, I have objected to the unanimous-consent request to proceed to the consideration of this legislation, thereby requiring the majority leader to make a debatable motion. I might observe that I think it is important to take some time to develop in full what is at issue here.

The proposal contained in S. 1017, which would involve the Federal Government in the two federally owned and operated commercial airports located in the Washington metropolitan area, is one with far-reaching significance. It is a matter of very vital concern to the State of Maryland which, of course, operates the third airport in this metropolitan area that interacts and interrelates with the two under consideration here.

I realize the majority leader is under some pressure on this bill at home, and I can appreciate that situation and, in some respects, sympathize with him. But I must say I think we have to develop the fact that a fire sale is being conducted at the Department of Transportation, the bargain basement disposal of Federal assets at a time when the pressure ought to be to realize the maximum amount possible from Federal assets. That is one of the issues involved with S. 1017. This ought to be a matter, I think, of very deep concern to every Member of the Senate.

Furthermore, when we are considering a bill of this sort, and it does involve important interests of the State of Virginia and the State of Maryland, it is very important to bear in mind how essential it is that the Federal Government act with impartiality in affairs affecting individual States. In other words, the actions of the Federal Government should favor no one State or jurisdiction at the expense of another. I intend to show in the course of this discussion a patent unfairness in this proposal with respect to the State of Maryland and the competitive position of the Baltimore-Washington International Airport as it operates in this regional market.

Mr. President, I want to go back and recount a little history for the Members of the Senate. The legislation before us stems in part from a report to the Secretary of Transportation issued by the advisory commission on the reorganization of the Metropolitan Washington Airports. That was a commission appointed by Secretary Dole and chaired by former Gov. Linwood Holton, of Virginia. Governor Holton has, in fact, been very much in evidence the last few days, speaking with Members about this legislation. I have a great deal of respect for Governor Holton, but I must say that one cannot be oblivious to the fact that the chair of the commission that looked into this question of dealing with these airports is himself a former chief executive officer of the State of Virginia.

When the Secretary of Transportation created this advisory commission, she gave it a very limited charge. In fact, the commission—and I served on the commission as one of the representatives from the State of Maryland—was in effect told not to determine whether the airports should be transferred. It was limited from looking at a broader authority that might encompass all airports—but simply how Dulles and National should be transferred. So there was a very narrow constraint placed on the work of the commission. In the end, a majority essentially composed of Virginia and D.C. representatives joined together in recommending that both airports—both airports—should be placed in one authority and that that authority should be governed by a skewed board that would consist of 11 members: five appointed by the Governor of Virginia, three by the Mayor of the District of Columbia—that is eight of the 11 right there—two by the Governor of Maryland and one by the President, the latter to have the advice and consent of the Senate, and that the chairman be selected from the membership.

The Maryland representatives on this commission put forward what we thought was a very reasonable proposition in terms of how this devolution of airorts should take place. There is, of course, a threshold question and that is whether it should happen at all, which involves very important questions of how one perceives the airports or what the Federal role in the operation of the airports should be. Maryland, in making its proposals, accepted the proposition that these airports should be moved to local or regional control, although I must say I think that is a proposition which can be argued. In other words, I think there is a reasonable case, given the finances of this matter, that in fact that should not happen. Certainly, how it is done and at what cost is related to the question of whether it should be done. In other words, one might accept the proposition that the airports should be moved out from Federal control and yet perceive the terms on which it is being done as unacceptable.

In this regard, I bring to the attention of the Members a letter from the National Taxpayers Union of recent origin, which says:

DEAR SENATOR. Soon you may be asked to vote on S. 1017, the Metropolitan Washington Airports Transfer Act. This bill would transfer ownership of Dulles and National Airports to an independent authority dominated by the Commonwealth of Virginia. We urge you to vote no on this sale.

Although we agree that the Federal Government should get out of the business of owning and managing airports, we are appalled at the ridiculously low sales price placed on these valuable properties. The combined market value of the properties is conservatively estimated at $1.5 billion to $2 billion. Yet the two airports are to be sold for only $47 million, about one thirty-fifth of their actual worth.

In addition, the transfer and future improvements are to be financed with tax-exempt bonds over a 30-year period. This adds up to a double soaking of the taxpayer. Given the Nation's tremendous budget deficits and $2 trillion national debt, it is fiscally irresponsible for the Federal Government to do anything but seek fair market value for the airports. Sound policy demands that the price tag on Dulles and National be raised to reflect their true worth. Otherwise, the sale should be rejected.

That is the end of the letter, Mr. President. That points up the relationship between the judgment as to whether the airports should be transferred and how it is proposed to transfer them and at what price. In fact, there are some who argue that they ought not to be transferred, that there is an important Federal interest in keeping the airports and in operating them, that that is the most sensible way to do it financially, and that the problems that people point out with the operations of these two airports in fact come from a failure to take a number of actions which should have been taken if one were using true business judgment. But I want to pass beyond that issue because, as I said, Maryland was prepared to come at this issue on the premise that a transfer, if it could be properly arranged or developed, should take place.

Our objection now is obviously that the terms on which this is taking place are unfair and inequitable to the Federal taxpayer and to the State of Maryland and its involvement in the regional airport picture. We think that what is taking place here is highly unfair in terms of competition. Maryland, in fact, welcomes competition between these airports, but thinks it should be done on a fair and reasonable basis.

For the purpose of aiding in understanding the background of this issue, I want to set out the Maryland proposition before the advisory commission on the reorganization of the Metropolitan Washington Airports, this commission which Secretary Dole established with a very limited mandate. In other words, its charge precluded from fully examining all questions involved—with respect to how these three major airports in this regional area should be dealt with.

The Secretary did that right at the outset. She narrowed the scope of examination and by doing that precluded the consideration of other alternatives that perhaps should have been entertained.

As I indicated, this was the Commission which former Governor Holton of Virginia chaired.

In an alternative report to the Commission, the Maryland representatives proposed, in terms of the structure, that National Airport should be transferred to an interstate authority and that Dulles Airport should be transferred to the State of Virginia. In effect, this created an equality between Dulles under the State of Virginia and BWI under the State of Maryland, with National, located in the center of this metropolitan region, being in an interstate authority, having a balanced membership. The proposal was that National would be under an interstate authority with three members each from the District of Columbia, Virginia, and Maryland, appointed by the Mayor and two Governors and that provision could be made, if it was considered desirable to include one or two representatives of the Federal Government appointed by the President in order to recognize the Federal interest in National Airport.

It was proposed that the members of this authority would serve staggered 6-year terms, would not hold elective or political office, would reside in the Washington metropolitan area, and would serve without compensation.

As part of this proposal it was put forward that Dulles would be transferred to the State of Virginia. Virginia then would have full policy and financing authority and responsibility for Dulles. It was our very strong view that this approach would reflect the significant interest of each of the principal jurisdictions in National Airport.

About 40 percent of the traffic of National originates in the District, about a little over a third from Virginia, and about a quarter from Maryland. So there is clearly substantial interest on the part of each of the three jurisdictions in this metropolitan area in National Airport. The origins at Dulles are much more substantially from Virginia, and the origins of BWI are much more substantially from Maryland.

It was felt that this approach would have allowed each of the principal jurisdictions to reflect their significant interest in National Airport, would allow Virginia to develop Dulles in the same way that Maryland is developing Baltimore-Washington International Airport.

What this approach did—and it is very important to understand this—is that by recognizing that all jurisdictions do not have equivalent interests in Dulles, it avoided the problem of fair representation which is inherent and perhaps insoluble in the single authority proposal. In other words, if you are going to put both airports in a single authority and then try to construct a governing board for that authority, it becomes difficult, given the heavy Dulles involvement in Virginia, to argue for an equal board, although the equal board, in my opinion, clearly makes the greatest sense for National Airport. Of course, putting the two airports in the same authority—and I am going to move on to this in a bit—creates very difficult competitive situation because of the cross-subsidization which can take place between National and Dulles, and therefore affect the competitive situation with respect to Baltimore-Washington International Airport, an airport which the State of Maryland bought in 1972 from the city of Baltimore for $36 million and subsequently has invested in it, at updated dollars, some quarter of a billion dollars.

There was another proposal made that if there was going to be a single board, at least the membership of that board be equal and at least deal with its jurisdictions in those terms. As I indicated, the counterargument to that is the degree of Virginia involvement in Dulles, but you are caught betwixt and between. If you put them in a single authority and then give a lopsided representation, as has happened in the proposal that is before us, that is unfair to the State of Maryland. It seemed to us that the way to break that problem was to put National in a single authority and to sell Dulles to the State of Virginia. In each instance to do it at a price that was reasonable under the circumstances and not to give it away as is happening with the proposal before us.

As I indicated, this proposition was not adopted by the Commission chaired by former Governor of Virginia Holton, and in fact the proposal, much like the one that is before us in S. 1017, was put forward by that Commission.

I feel very strongly that this is not the way to address this problem. It seems to me that the Secretary should have been engaged in a much more extended and detailed discussion with the respective jurisdictions trying to work out an arrangement that all perceived as fair and acceptable.

Governor Hughes of our State, has taken a very strong position on this. It is not a new issue. It has been before the country on previous occasions. In his concern he indicated: First, Maryland's role in the proposed Airports Authority in setting out the areas of concern. Second, the financial aspects of the proposed transfer. Third, the status of Maryland-owned and operated Baltimore-Washington International Airport with respect to the transfer, and finally the disposition of three key elements of the existing Federal regulatory scheme governing the two Federal airports.

Mr. President, let me make it very clear. Maryland welcomes a competitive situation and we believe in fact that if you structure a situation of fair competition it can result in enhancing air services in the Washington region, but we do not think that this bill does that. By lumping the two in one authority, by constructing the governing board of that authority in such a way that Maryland is really a dissenting voice without weight, by permitting the finances of one of these airports to be used in effect to underwrite the other, we have created a situation in which Maryland faces unfair competition. It is very important to recognize that.

Mr. President, I understand that my distinguished colleague from South Carolina wishes to address this issue because he has an engagement he must get to. I will be happy to yield the floor at this time in order that he may have the opportunity to speak.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to proceed.

Mr. HOLLINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank my distinguished colleague from Maryland.

Mr. President, the engagement referred to by the Senator from Maryland is the Budget Committee, which is just about ready—in the next 3 or 4 hours this afternoon—to finalize, I believe, a bipartisan solution to our deficit requirements, the requirement that we submit a budget within the confines of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

It has been quite a marathon, working among Senators, their staffs, and the agencies of Government. I think we are right at the point where we have the votes and can at least get a budget to the floor that takes care of the needs of our Government.

The reason why I mention that in detail is that we are right now engaged in what troubles us and what causes this tremendous trauma of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. It is quite obvious that that is not the smoothest way to run Government.

What that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings initiative says is this: You go to the doctor, and the doctor says that by October 1 you either lose 38 pounds or else. How you are to lose the 38 pounds is your business. You can go on whatever diet you wish. You can provide it all by what we call the social or domestic programs. You can cut some more taxes or you can increase the revenues in order to pay the bill. But pay the bill you must. You must provide the revenues for whatever you appropriate.

In that light, if you pay the bill, there is no trigger, there is no Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. It fixes that responsibility on the Congress But if you come back on October 1 and have not lost that 38 pounds, thereupon, we are going to wire your jaw, and you are not going to eat anything until you do. That is how traumatic it is.

The reason we get into these traumas is apparent right here on the airport bill. It is amazing to me—and I should not be amazed—how the tail wags the dog, how the news media sets the pace. We get "Airports On Standby In Senate" on March 15—last Saturday.

The Washington Post says on that day we should clear it for a vote. So, by Wednesday morning we clear it for a vote.

This editorial in the Post says that this is the proposal—talking about the airport transfer bill—that we turn the two airports over to a regional authority responsible to the people and governments of Greater Washington.

Well, I guess we lumped in there the U.S. Government along with the city council of Arlington, maybe, or the Garden Club at Bolling, or whatever. I do not know what governments they are talking about.

They say it is a sensible and overdue delegation of Federal authority and a smart approach. I do not think it is smart at all.

Not long ago, I went to Greenville, SC, and I walked into an industry named Woven Electronics and met a former college mate who was a senior when I was a freshman. He has a very responsible, profit-making organization that has grown by leaps and bounds, and they have civilian as well as military business.

As an example of just exactly what is required with respect to an order from the Pentagon, he had an order from Burroughs Adding Machine Co. He pointed to that particular order and he said: "We got this order yesterday, on Monday, and we will fill it tomorrow, on Wednesday. We will have that out in 2 days, without any trouble."

The senior Senator from Virginia, who could well be the chairman of our Armed Services Committee before long, will be interested in this. My friend said: "Here is a similar order from the military, the Federal Government. Here are the requirements."

He pointed to two big stacks of documents, papers, rehearsals, reports, findings, requirements. He said:

> We'll negotiate the answer and we'll correspond and we'll talk, and it will take 6 months for what would be a 2-day order if it were from the civilian sector. Why? Because, in general, you folks in Congress require this and the next thing and another requirement and another one.

We are politically sort of supercautious. If we can put all these requirements into a particular measure, if we can require all the audits and reports and hearings and findings and everything else, then we think we really have economy in Government. But in reality, the waste, fraud, and abuse that we all berate in Government begins right here, on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

Nothing is exposed so dramatically as the waste, fraud, and abuse in this airport bill. I call it a conspiracy.

I do not blame my Virginia friends a bit. If they can pick up this multimillion dollar property for peanuts and politically operate it, they are taking care of their financial problems in Virginia. They are taking care of their political problems in Virginia. But they are giving a fiscal headache, with respect to the facilities of the governments, to the people of the United States.

At another airport last week—I spend half my life at these airports—I ran into a colleague and friend who is on the Commission to commemorate the 200th birthday, next year, of the Constitution of the United States. He put a pin in my lapel: "We the People."

It reminded me at the time of Watergate, when the people throughout this land were looking for sustenance and stability.

As the late Senator from Minnesota, Hubert Humphrey, used to say, that the Constitution did not start off with the people saying, "We the Constitution," or "We the executive branch," or "We the Congress," or "We the Supreme Court." But, in contrast, it commences, "We the people."

And there is the significant feature here of the airports at Dulles and the National. They belong to the people of the United States, and we have that responsibility as the people's representatives here in the national Congress. The responsibility is here, and generally speaking they say we have met up to those responsibilities save and except keeping pace with modernization and demands.

Studies have been made—and the Federal Aviation Administration, Republican administrations, Democratic administrations have come during the past several years and stated categorically—that what we really need is modernization out at National. We need some parking facilities. And out of Dulles we need an infield terminal, maybe two or three kinds of infield terminals, to give the expanded service that is needed there at Dulles.

These two airports are working well. They are making a profit. People are going in and out and they are not falling apart, and if it ain't broke, don't fix it. Now, like the telephone company, we are going to fix this one up. We are going to put it into a political mess and you are going to have the dichotomy on the Commission between the District, Maryland, and the State of Virginia with us in the Congress more or less looked upon with the responsibility still and not able to do a blooming thing about it.

I would hate to have to come up here and say, well, we are short of money down in Richmond. I have run a State government and when you run a State government and you look around and you have a nice fat facility down there in the district and after all it is not looked upon so much as a State asset because it really serves the people of the United States. In Arlington they think it is a nuisance and that they ought to close it. They forget the days when we first started out when there was a Hoover Field where the Pentagon now is. Before they built that Pentagon, we had an airfield there, and we transferred it over to the National Airport and then everybody built around it and then started complaining. "It makes too much noise, too much traffic, get rid of the nuisance," and everything else like that. They'll say "we can now operate everything we need to operate without that and so let us tax it a little bit more. We can balance the budget in Richmond, and take care of those needs under the authority that is so wise, so smart."

Let us look, for example, Mr. President, at what this editorial in the Washington Post says.

The proposal makes good financial sense, too. The regional airport authority could float tax exempt bonds to underwrite improvements at National and Dulles.

Mind you me, those two statements are in contradiction of themselves. Tax exempt bonds make no financial sense at all when you have the money in the Government till that the users of those two particular airports have already paid for over the many, many years—to modernize, to put in the infield facilities, to put in the parking facilities. The money is sitting there. It cannot be used. It is in a trust fund. It has been there.

The Airport and Airways Trust Fund that was established by Congress long ago is to be used exclusively for the development and improvement of airports and airways.

It is a $7.7 billion fund, I say to the Senator from Maryland. Even with all the expenditures on schedule, if you just take and commit the moneys to all of them, which I doubt will occur this year, but if you did it all, you still have a $4 billion surplus over there that can be only used for this. I resent the idea it makes financial sense that I have to pay double. I am a user. I came through Dulles last weekend, the day before yesterday, on Sunday. I went out on National. I'm due to go out on Dulles again on Friday maybe and come back on National again on Saturday. But that is the life and work of a Senator who represents the people of the United States. And here I am paying into that trust fund each time I go through for all the impovements and all the particular needs for safety and otherwise. And now they tell me it is a smart idea that I have to go out and borrow the money.

When President Carter wanted to fix up his airport down there in Atlanta at Hartsfield he just took $100 million out of the trust fund. That was just one section of the country. That was not the people's airport. If the Washington Post thinks we shouldn't do the same for the airport users around here they better illuminate themselves. The city of Atlanta, yes, that belongs to that community and that particular facility, but President Carter took from that trust fund of the people $100 million. President Johnson got $150 million for Houston and Dallas.

At St. Thomas, in the Virgin Islands, we figured out we ought to really lengthen the runway so everybody can go down and get the sun. Now we are not getting enough sunshine. We ought to lengthen that runway and build it into the water. There aren't enough parking facilities there to satisfy a traffic jam. And we didn't provide any money for infield facilities for more efficient use, or anything like that. They just figured what we ought to do with that little island was inundate it and overrun it with people who had the money to fly all the way down to get the sunshine. Se we just spent $90 million from the trust fund on that. We did not have any difficulty there.

But all of a sudden when we want to spend $250 million over a 5-year period for the American people's airport at Dulles, the American people's airport at National, which are already making a profit, therein it is a smart idea to give the airport facilities away. They are worth at least $200 million, and we want to give them away for $47 million and let in a mixed authority from the various surrounding States and the District of Columbia come in and let them argue and talk about what their need for the District is or what the need for Maryland is or what the need in Virginia is—but not what the needs of the people are. This is a commuter service for the people of the United States who come to and from their National Government.

Incidentally, on the breakdown, Mr. President, my good friend Mayor Marion Barry, did not get equal rights. Any study of this particular airport facility and usage would show that 40 percent of it comes out of the District of Columbia. But they did not get 40 percent representation on this particular authority. I am really surprised at that. That came out at the hearing, that we did not get equal rights for the District.

I happen to have a home here in the District and been in it now for just going on 20 years, so I feel very keenly about the District as the Senator from Virginia feels keenly about Virginia and the Senator from Maryland feels keenly about his great State.

The District of Columbia is not getting anything other than minority rights all over again, and we ought to be assured of at least the proper representation if we had an authority.

But, mind you me, they just didn't want to really study about the needs and the projected usage and everything else of that kind.

What really has occurred here in this particular measure is that the Secretary of Transportation is like the old woman who lived in the shoe. She has got so many concerns and other worries she doesn't know what to do. If you are Secretary of Transportation you have really become educated as to the numerous responsibilities that you have.

I have seen this happen over 20 years with the various Secretaries. The Secretary of Commerce comes in and he finds out it is a big department. He has come in there for international business and he has trade and he has the business communities on his mind. And now he finds, Heavens above, he has the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the weather. He is interested in the business weather, the business climate. He is not interested in the normal climate, the weather climate in this land. He looks and finds out he has thousands and thousands of employees in the deep oceans with the atmospheric and the ocean studies and everything else of that kind. And so he says, "Look, I am a pretty good cow puncher but you can't lasso a whale. Let me get rid of this one and cut it." Every time they call over to the Department of Commerce he cuts the NOAA budget because he does not want it.

Someone rings up the Secretary of Transportation and tells them they have parking difficulties or they lost their baggage at National and they say, "Oh, my, there is a headache there. I don't want to even hear any more about it."

They do not ask for the money. They do not ask for the money at all. The money is in the till in the trust fund. But there is no request by the Secretary of Transportation to improve the airports.

These funds are easily provided by the trust fund and, incidentally, I will get to that because I am hoisted by my own petard of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I am in a position where I cannot ask for it because I have to match it off with a zero sum amendment and tell you where the revenues are coming from. But I really don't need to do this. There is a trust fund and the money is there. I shouldn't have to provide offsetting programs to the tune of $250 million, which, of course, my colleagues would not want to vote for because they are interested in their own projects and programs, whether they be defense, education, or whatever. All of these programs have been cut pretty well down to the bone. We have been playing the game of chicken to see who is going to be blamed for the deficit.

Unfortunately, they are blaming this side of the aisle and, therefore, we had to come in with the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. But right now I am caught by it. I cannot introduce that amendment unless it is a zero sum amendment.

I have put in a bill that has been introduced and is pending now in the Commerce Committee to see if we could not just go ahead and put it in the budget and perhaps later, when we debate the budget on the floor, we will have an amendment and sufficient support to allocate those funds from the trust fund, the Airport and Airways, Trust Fund, to Dulles and National, so we can get on with the work and not all the extra costs.

But, back to the Secretary of Transportation, she comes in with the Coast Guard and finds out, "Where in the heavens did I ever get this?"

I remember Secretary Volpe. He and I were Governors together. He is from Massachusetts. I asked him, "Mr. Secretary, if you ever had to organize the Transportation Department, would you put the Coast Guard in it?" He said, "Absolutely not."

But all of a sudden he has 40,000 people in his Department and he is about to throw them out until he finds out they got three good airplanes that he can travel around the world in and another plane that he can crisscross the country in—they are jets—and he has got a wonderful mess—a Philippine mess.

We used to think the Philippine mess was a place to eat. Now it is Imelda Marcos' clothes and shoes and dresses and everything else.

But the Philippine mess that the Secretary of Transportation inherited was a many splendored thing. They could sit down there and eat like kings and call on the jets and travel. And they learned pretty quickly over in Transportation, "Don't worry about the 40,000, just send up the promotions. The Coast Guard can look out for itself."

The fact is, it cannot. We in the Budget Committee, for example, have to increase it. We have increased the size of the United States by one-third some 8 years ago when we increased the 200-mile economic zone, the 200-mile limit out in the seas. We have increased the size of the United States but systematically decreased the size of the Coast Guard to police that area and the likes of the drug problem that continues to consume us all. So we have got real headaches there.

But the Secretary of Transportation figures, "Now, I'm on a roll. I have got Conrail and all I need to do is get the same crowd and we will get rid of these airports and then, before long, we will have enough time to travel around in those Coast Guard planes and make those wonderful talks around the country and tell what a great job we are doing."

Well, Mr. President, when the distinguished Secretary of Transportation, Mrs. Dole, called me—you know that I have the highest respect for her—I immediately called on my experience in signing these tax-exempt bonds.

Let us dwell on that a minute. Back when I was Governor we did not have those stylus automatic machines that just sit there and put the signatures on things all morning while you are jabbering politics, or whatever. You had to literally sign those bonds—millions of dollars in bonds for your State for airports, for highways, mental health facilities, penal facilities, all the institutions. So you knew what bond lawyers cost. You knew the time and delays involved in the bonds. And then you knew, of course, of the particular added cost or loss of revenue since they are tax exempt.

And we get back to the particular little editorial in the Post on how smart it is and it makes financial sense. This is where the waste, fraud, and abuse comes in. Because here, in order to get $250 million in improvements that we all agree are needed—no dispute about the administrative capabilities of Mr. Engen and the Federal Aviation Administration and the Department of Transportation—rather, in order to get that $250 million, I have to spend $712 million.

At least the Reagan administration agrees that it does not make financial sense, because they have come out and said, "Let's don't float tax-exempt bonds." You look at Treasury I and look at Treasury II and they do away with tax-exempt bonds. Why? Because it does not make financial sense to the Reagan administration, the very crowd that is asking for tax-exempt bonds to finance airports.

We had a little tiff at the Commerce Committee hearings because I was asking the proponents, "Do you support the President on 'Let's do away with these tax-exempt bonds because they don't make good financial sense' or do you think they do make good financial sense?"

We never could get an answer. It was a very interesting thing because I know what the financial sense was, having signed these bonds and knowing exactly what they cost. Because you look at the 15-percent limitation, usually, upon every State in America in order to maintain a triple A credit rating if you want to be able to continue to issue financially viable bonds at the lowest rate, then you have to stay within that constitutional provision not only in that regard but make sure you hold back and you are just not willy-nilly offering bond issues for any and every kind of everyday need.

So I resisted. I asked the distinguished Secretary, "Where are you coming from?" And I could tell from her answers that she just wanted to get rid of this particular headache. No, she had not asked for the money for improvements out of this administration. No, she had not figured out really how much it would cost from the authority.

Then what study was really made in the Department of Transportation? I was looking for the study. We kept talking in an erudite fashion. When Governor Holton came up with his so-called study commission, we found out they were not studying anything. They were told to fix it—"Fix the deal. Get PAUL SARBANES and Governor Hughes and that Maryland crowd satisfied and take care of Marion Barry and come on back in here and get our crowd satisfied. Fix the deal and then come on back and we will run it. We have got legislation already drawn. We know what we want to do. You just tell us the numbers everybody will go along with them."

That is all it was. There was not any study of usage. There was not any study of allocation. They still do not know the facilities we have at Dulles. We will, in this debate—as it goes on several days, I take it—we will bring out what they really have at Dulles and the acreage out there and what some of it has been used for and the cost of it to other agencies of Government that many in this Congress do not even understand.

So the committee did not have an in-depth study. When you heard the Holton Commission—let us refer to that as the "Holton fix." It was not a commission. It was a fix and he got it fixed. It was not a good, unanimous fix. We have the dissent. We have our distinguished friends from Maryland who come forth and brought out many of these factors that I am citing to you right here and now.

They said, "Oh, no, that can't go and that can't be." They have been over there in Maryland running what was an airport important to that particular State and that particular area and community. And Maryland showed the foresight to come forward and bond itself for its particular interests over there with its authority and spend their good taxpayers' money to keep current and keep competitive with the Federal facilities over here. And they had shown that willingness to sacrifice over the years, and now they would be given a minority position on the Commission and no chance to compete.

The moneymaking National could subsidize Dulles and allow that airport to take business away from Baltimore—just move it all out and put it over there.

And talk about making good financial sense, the distinguished Governor from Maryland came to the hearing and when they said, $47 million, he said, "I double the offer right here and now. I will give you $94 million. I will give you $94 million right here and now at this particular hearing. Maryland would be delighted to pay that amount."

And they all smiled because it did not affect "the fix." They have all gone around and worked and worked. If they want to know, there is no "airports on standby" in the Senate. It has been months since we last heard about it. That is not the last our colleagues have heard about it.

It has been an ongoing fix. What you do is get enough votes. You do not want to discuss the merits. You do not want to discuss the cost. You do not want to really discuss the residents. You can say we ought to get through it. And, you know, these courts work good. And let us get that thing in to the authority. And we can all go a heck of a lot more.

Of course, the folks are not thinking it through, wanting to help a fellow Senator, and saying, "Heck, I will vote for that. Yes. I guess so." And so they get "the fix" on. Then they bring it to the floor. They did not think they could get enough votes, I guess, to race it on through. That is what held it up.

I commend my distinguished colleague from Maryland for his hold on this thing. It should not be called for consideration. I do not see how in conscience we can in one breath go through all of the machinations that we have been going through now for a good 3 weeks. Domenici-Chiles could be well called Boschwitz-Hollings and others who have gone on a bipartisan approach to answer our budget responsibilities as manager CHILES has been going on with. Senator DOMENICI and Senator CHILES have been working for weeks on end, and on weekends, to save a little here and a little there, to watch these trust funds, and watch out for the outyear costs to the Government.

We are looking at student housing. We are looking at all of the things that are costing the Government money. We think we are now becoming fiscally responsible. And now we want to come down on the floor and start another revenue hemorrhage with airport authority bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary Regan, in Treasury I and Treasury II, said we ought to do away with these tax-exempt bonds because they are just a revenue hemorrhage. They are costing the people way more money than they should.

We are going to have to pay for all of these lawyers fees, court cases, disputes, and everything else where we do not have to hire lawyers. We do not have to put out any of these feelers, and then amend the law further, go up to the court on appeal and have all of the delays.

We have the money. The word is "trust." It has been in trust for the improvements of these airports. I so told the Secretary. I said, Secretary Dole, why do you not ask for the money and let us get on? I am for it. I am confident that if you ask for it, if the administration asks for it—and with the Budget Committee, the Appropriations Committee, and the authorizing committee having a three-way check—I would be delighted to sort of bicycle this around, talk to everyone, and see if we cannot get it in there as a study need. It is a study over there. Then there is the Transportation Department as to the mid-field facilities, and the modernization at the National Airport itself.

But the Secretary said no. She did not want to do that. She wanted to go ahead with this authority. In going ahead with the authority, she mentioned, of course, that we should look at the New York-New Jersey Airport and Port Authority operation there. That is like the United Nations. It operates—or you survive—as a result of a veto. There is not a veto here with this airport proposal. If the Governor of New Jersey can veto and also the Governor of New York, even with a veto they get into pretty heated arguments and discussions. I remember one, way back, under Governor Rockefeller. We will get into that later. They do not work all that smoothly. They can get into some real jams, if you please.

That is not necessarily a good example because that is not what they provided. But they just provide for the customary thing that has been required by communities all over the country in order to have authorities and issue the bonds.

They say it works so well. Why can it not work here? But here you already are starting off with competitive airport facilities.

The authorities have not been put in a competitive position. They have been put in there for authority policy—such as in Charleston, SC, Richmond, VA, the other cities in America—Charlotte, NC, and others. I could go right on down the list. They are not in competition. At Hartsfield in Atlanta or the one at Dallas. And they do not have any competition really from Love Field. They have a wonderful time just making their own decisions and do not have to make decisions for numerous airports in several States and the District of Columbia.

So the example is not necessarily well taken. I can see some political headaches emanating from this so-called authority that the distinguished Secretary of Transportation thought so well of.

We have gotten to the bottom line about the loss of revenues. Under those tax exempt bonds, it not only costs more for the issuance of the bonds. The issuance costs $346.2 million. I am going into this. I will yield back to my distinguished colleague from Maryland. But the $346.2 million is from the nonpartisan, bipartisan Congressional Budget Office.

This is one of the few fiscal studies. If there is another fiscal study, I would like to know where the proponents have it. They ought to work for the CIA because they have kept it top secret. I have not been able to find it. Where is the Holton Commission study? Where is their financial analysis? They did not want any.

But we had to go to the Congressional Budget Office to get the $346.2 million cost figure for the issuance of the bonds. As for the tax expenditure, which the Finance Committee handles now and which we know euphemistically as loopholes—the cost of the Treasury is $366.3 million over the 30 years.

That is a total cost to the U.S. Treasury of $712.5 million.

That is where waste, fraud, and abuse commences—here on the floor of the U.S. Senate. We praise each other for being so distinguished. We praise each other for being so smart, as the editorial says. We praise each other for the good financial sense.

You can tell when people want something. They just disregard the fact. They disregard the economics of it. They just call it good financial sense. And then they get to the tax-exempt bonds.

And I guess I can find another editorial. I will get that from the New Republic where they are always putting in conflicting headlines from the same newspaper on a different page. I bet you I can find that one of the Washington Post and forward it to them where they said it is not good financial sense on the matter of the tax-exempt bonds. So we will have it coming from both sides in the same newspaper on a different page on a different day.

But for starters, regional authority would improve the sound barrier at National. I doubt it. For starters, they would get organized politically and start hearing from the local communities which they are responsive to. And for starters they would start hiring lawyers and they will start hiring bureaucracy and overhead.

I do not see any budget cut from the Department of Transportation on this one. I would like to see the consummate costs they are going to have for that new airport authority, and see if we cannot cut the Federal Aviation Administration budget because they have been relieved of all of these duties. I can tell you here and now they are asking for increases. They are asking for increases, and everyone is talking about airport safety. We will not save the money.

We will start, Mr. President, with waste, fraud, and abuse of the taxpayers' money right here on the floor of the U.S. Senate. I understand that my distinguished colleague from Maryland has already put in a communication from one group, the National Taxpayers Union. They wrote all of us a letter on March 18. I will not repeat the contents of that letter except for the fact that there are interested parties out there watching.

My hope was that the Members of the U.S. Congress would stop, look, and listen—and not just because we have a very attractive, very competent, and very able Secretary of Transportation come over to just ask for what seems like an offhand request that ought to be run right on through—when we actually end up with added costs, added bureaucracy, and really an unfair situation to the Baltimore International Airport in Maryland.

I use that example, incidentally, because BWI has the direct flight from Piedmont to Charleston, SC. Many times I can go right to Baltimore and get back home a lot quicker than I can going through National and laying over in Charlotte, NC, because I do much better with the connections that you have developed over at the Baltimore International.

I appreciate that airport, too. I am not necessarily in the middle of the argument between my colleagues from Maryland and Virginia on that score, but I certainly understand it. I am willing to stand here with my colleague from Maryland and do our best to try to explain this to some extent.

Mr. President, I yield the floor back to the distinguished Senator from Maryland and I thank him for his indulgence in allowing me to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mrs. KASSEBAUM]. The question is on the motion to proceed.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, I thank the distinguished Senator from South Carolina for his very perceptive remarks. He has been following this issue very closely for a long time and has been intimately acquainted with it in the committee.

I would say to the Senator that I agree with his evaluation of the Secretary of Transportation as being intelligent and experienced. But what we have here is a bargain basement sale of these facilities. If I were a Virginian, I would be running all the way to the airport on this thing because it is a tremendous deal for Virginia. But it is at the expense of the Federal taxpayer and to the very strong and distinct competitive disadvantage of the State of Maryland. It is highly unfair.

I also noted when the distinguished Senator from South Carolina made reference to the New York-New Jersey airport authority, that that authority is composed of equal membership from the two States. Beyond that, the Governor of each State, of New York and of New Jersey, has the veto power over the actions of the authority.

I think Maryland would be quite amenable to the Secretary trying to work out some comparable sort of arrangement in this region as it involved our Governors and others intimately involved.

Madam President, before the Senator from South Carolina spoke, I was going to point out some of the testimony of Governor Hughes when he appeared in the Congress.

First of all, on the subject of Maryland's role in the proposed airport authority, the Governor pointed out that S. 1017 defines a local community in two fashions: first, the legislation evisions transfer of the federally owned airports to an independent authority created by the Commonwealth of Virginia and the District of Columbia.

The Federal legislation provides for the membership and gives Maryland 2 on this 11-member board, but the authority which that membership is going to govern does not involve the State of Maryland in its creation. It is to be legally created only by the Commonwealth of Virginia and by the District of Columbia.

That board, as we noted earlier, is composed of five individuals appointed by the Governor of Virginia and three by the Mayor of the District of Columbia, two from Maryland, and a Presidential appointee.

In Maryland's view the proposed authority structure is asymmetric and cannot be fairly characterized as turning National and Dulles over to local control.

Recognizing that the Maryland suburbs of Greater Washington represent approximately 40 percent of the region's population, it seems that Maryland, with just two votes on an 11-member panel, fails to achieve equal representative. Many Maryland travelers make extensive use of the two Federal airports, with Washington National playing a particularly important role.

Based on the 1981-82 survey of air passengers conducted by the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments, over three-quarters of a million air travelers, 14 percent of National's total traffic, began their trips in Maryland's Montgomery County not in Maryland but in Montgomery County, MD, alone.

Fairfax County, in Virginia, registered a 15-percent share; the District, a 40-percent share.

So 70 percent of the traffic moving through National Airport came from the District of Columbia and from these two jurisdictions, two counties, one in Maryland and one in Virginia.

In addition, of course, the thousands of Maryland residents from other parts of the State make use of National, as I indicated earlier, bringing the figure up to close to a quarter.

Furthermore, there is a noise problem connected with this airport. I hope to develop that later, particularly in view of the fact that the distinguished Senator from Virginia got the committee, after it had reported the bill, to add an amendment dealing with the noise issue, and placing control over the noise question in the airport authority, dominated by Members from the State of Virginia.

It does not take much imagination to anticipate what is going to happen on the noise issue at National Airport, which has been an extremely serious issue. In fact, Maryland and Virginia have worked together to try to protect their people from excessive noise.

The change made by this late starter amendment added after the markup is going to make it possible for the authority to, in effect, shift and place that noise on the Maryland side of the Potomac. Two voices on an 11-man authority can only speak so loudly and, clearly, they can be outvoted again and again and again.

As I noted, during the deliberations of the advisory commission, Maryland advanced an alternate plan calling for transfer of National to an interstate authority and Dulles to the Commonwealth of Virginia. Maryland tried to be positive and constructive in this situation.

National, under that proposal, would have been placed under a 9-member interstate authority composed of three members each from the District, Virginia, and Maryland appointed by the Mayor and the two Governors. One or more representatives of the Federal Government could be included for proper representation of the Federal interest in National Airport.

I do think there is a Federal interest and that that is being badly neglected in this legislation. It is something many Members need to focus upon, as the distinguished Senator from South Carolina mentioned.

I obviously have a pressing responsibility to present Maryland's case and particularly to make the point that in this proposed legislation which the Secretary of Transportation has sent to us the Federal Government is not acting with impartiality in affairs affecting individual States. It is, fact, favoring one State at the expense of another. It seems to me that one of the essential prerequisites of moving on this issue should have been that the States were going to receive fair and equitable treatment without one being placed at a competitive disadvantage.

Let me turn to the financial and competitive aspects of the proposed transfer, Madam President, which are extremely important. I have talked about the composition of the authority and the governance that would prevail and the fact that by taking both airports and putting them in one Authority, by giving an asymetrical weighting of that Authority heavily in favor of the State of Virginia, that is unfair to Maryland's role in the regional airport situation. But I want to turn now to the financial aspects of the proposed transfer and its competitive aspects.

In the commission's deliberations, Virginia argued that the Maryland approach of having National under multijurisdictional authority and Dulles go to the State of Virginia was not viable because it worked to deprive Dulles of a revenue base sufficient to support its capital development needs. With all due respect, I might point out that the State of Maryland, when it purchased BWI from the city of Baltimore in 1972, did not enjoy a National Airport cash cow to support the physical redevelopment of that airport. In fact, the State had to undertake an investment in that airport in order to realize what it is not realizing, and that is significant dividends. It does not seem unreasonable to expect that the State of Virginia should undertake the same responsibility with respect to Dulles International Airport.

In fact, the traffic at Dulles has increased markedly even within the last year, since studies were made about its financial viability. It is my own view that updated figures need to be taken into account. Dulles is producing an operating profit now, contrary to what was earlier the case. In 1984, it registered almost a 20-percent jump in total commercial passengers, and a 24-percent jump in air freight.

One of the issues involved in this question of financial viability is the question of cross-subsidization. In effect, this legislation, by placing the two airports in one Authority, would permit them to draw on the airport trust funds which, up to now, they have not done because they have had a direct line in the Federal budget. It also would allow them to continue to cross-subsidize to a limited extent. It is important to understand this issue, because it really affects the financial competitive situation.

Since 1966, landing fees at National and Dulles have been set at a common rate by pooling the total landed weight of carriers serving both airports. In addition to this single-cash-register approach to revenues, airfield costs were necessarily combined on National and Dulles as well. By treating National and Dulles as one revenue-cost center, landing fees at the more heavily utilized National, in effect, underwrite the fee structure at Dulles, thereby making it a lower cost facility than it otherwise would be for carriers basing operatings there. Simply stated, fees at Dulles are set below cost with National's revenue stream making up the difference.

So, for instance, in the particular case of foreign flag carriers, where BWI and Dulles typically find themselves in direct competition for services, subsidized fees at Dulles potentially could be enough to artificially tip the scales in its favor. Given that S. 1017 makes National and Dulles eligible for airport improvement program funding in lieu of the current practice of obtaining line-item funding via the annual USDOT appropriations bill, this ability to cross-subsidize is particularly burdensome. In fact, as a matter of public policy, I think it is legitimate to question whether this practice is appropriate, particularly in light of the sponsorship requirements set forth in section 511 of the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982, which includes a requirement that an airport operator or owner maintain a fee and rental structure for the facilities and services being provided the airport users which will make the airport as self-sustaining as possible under the circumstances existing at that particular airport.

Let me repeat that, Madam President:

> Maintain a fee and rental structure for the facilities and services being provided the airport users which will make the airport as self-sustaining as possible under the circumstances existing at that particular airport.

I emphasize "at that particular airport."

The framers of S. 1017—actually, this was not included in S. 1017 until it was submitted. It was added, in fact, in the committee because clearly, the problem I am talking about, to any fair and objective observer, creates an unfair and inequitable situation. So, in the committee, an amendment was made. I quote it now. It is at pages 41 and 42 of S. 1017.

(8) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no landing fee imposed for operating an aircraft or revenues derived from parking automobiles—

(A) at Washington Dulles International Airport may be used for maintenance or operating expenses (excluding debt service, depreciation, and amortization) at Washington National Airport; or

(B) at Washington National Airport may be used for maintenance or operating expenses (excluding debt service, depreciation, and amortization) at Washington Dulles International Airport.

It is asserted that this takes care of the cross-subsidy issue.

Only partly, Mr. President. And to the extent that it does not fully take care of it, it makes it possible in effect to subsidize at a virtually unlimited level. This language excludes from the prohibition of using landing fees or parking revenues debt services, depreciation, and amortization. In other words, landing fees and parking revenues at one airport can be used for debt services, depreciation and amortization at another airport. And so the capital improvement costs at one airport can be underwritten by the revenues at another airport.

Let me just dwell on that point for a moment longer. Maryland's position put very simply on this financial question is that it is unfair, unfair to Maryland and Baltimore-Washington International Airport, to be in competition with Dulles Internatioal Airport if Dulles International Airport can be underwritten in one way or another by revenues from Washington National Airport.

In other words, each of these airports ought to stand on its own, and that to underwrite one from the revenues of another opens up a clear opportunity for competitive disadvantage. Maryland is prepared to compete against Dulles. Maryland put forward the proposal that Dulles be transferred to the State of Virginia; that the State of Virginia undertake responsibility for it; that Dulles and Baltimore-Washington International Airport, therefore, each of them under their respective States, be placed in an equal competitive position; that Washington National Airport be separate and apart from both and in its own authority, and that any possibility of a cross-subsidy be eliminated.

Now, as I have just indicated, this very language still permits the use of landing fees and parking revenues to be used for debt service, depreciation, and amortization at the other airport. That is not precluded. That link is not broken.

The second opportunity that exists, on pages 36 and 37 of the legislation, is the opportunity to develop "for airport purposes" all of that acreage at Dulles, including development for nonaviation business or activities provided the revenues are used for the airport authority. So that the use of the acreage is not just limited to airport purposes but also is allowed for nonaviation business or activities. So that all of this land the Federal Government is turning over to this authority at virtually no cost—the estimate of the value on that property has been put in the hundreds of millions of dollars—and of course the revenue generated is then available to the authority.

This Federal gift of highly attractive, undeveloped land at Dulles is a windfall to the new airport authority. It is conservatively estimated at 2,000 developable acres. The authority has virtually no fixed costs with respect to that acreage. It will therefore be available to negotiate extremely attractive lease arrangements, really divorced from normal market considerations, and enter into the widest possible range of joint venture projects with potential developers.

Assume for the moment that a thousand developable acres at Dulles valued at approximately $100,000 per acre and a 10-percent lease rate for a 20-year term. You would conservatively estimate a potential income stream to the new authority in excess of $200 million.

Now, that is fine for the new authority and it is terrific for the State of Virginia. I notice my able colleague from Virginia nodding his head, and he is absolutely right. It is a terrific proposition. The question is, Is it a fair proposition for the Federal taxpayer and the Federal Government to dispose of these assets at virtually nothing, and is it fair to the State of Maryland which is engaged in a competitive position?

BWI is not afraid to compete, but having the Federal Government essentially give away an undeveloped area, roughly two-thirds the size of BWI's entire 4,200 acre site, seems to be an extreme test of fairness. People have got to stop, as my distinguished colleague from South Carolina said, stop, look, and listen at what is being done. Enormously valuable assets are being put into this authority at hardly any cost, and the transfer of this land with its tremendous potential value, poses potentially adverse consequences for BWI and Maryland's ability to compete effectively for new commercial enterprise and investment.

I want to stress Maryland is ready, willing, and able to compete, but we want a fair competitive situation. S. 1017 does not establish such a situation. First of all, the cost of the transfer is so low that it is very close to giving the assets away. The Grace Commission in their report looked at this and came up with lots of different figures. They finally settled on a figure of $340 million, with a range between $200 million and well over $400 million. It is difficult to know what valuation technique to use, but any of the ones ordinarily relied upon provide figures far, far larger than what is involved in this bill.

This is really a giveaway. It is a giveaway of these facilities, thereby putting the authority at the very outset in such an unfairly strong competitive position that that, in and of itself, raises very serious questions.

Second, by putting the two airports in the same authority and by not absolutely severing completely one airport's ability to support the activities at another airport, it leaves open the possibility of a cross-subsidy essentially from National to Dulles, which would enable Dulles then to compete with BWI on other than an equal basis.

The other point, of course, with respect to a form of cross-subsidy that I think needs to be touched upon is that with both airports in one authority and with the slots at Washington National Airport limited and highly desirable, it is possible for the authority to use access to the Washington Natinal Airport slots in order to have carriers undertake service at Dulles. I think it is unfair.

I believe that carriers should make the judgment on whether they are going to go to Dulles or BWI on the basis of appropriate competition between those two airports. Dulles should have to stand on its own finances, and its charges should be related thereto, and the same thing at BWI. Whether a carrier goes to one or the other ought to be determined by each airport in competition. Dulles ought not be able to be financially underwritten from the other airport under the authority, National, which is far more profitable, in order to gain an unfair competitive advantage.

Beyond the finances, it stands to reason that access to the highly desirable National slots—an airport within 10 minutes of downtown Washington, it is highly sought after by the airlines; passengers like to fly in and be across the river and into the District in 5 or 10 minutes, in nonrush-hour traffic. Access to those slots, since you have one authority, can be used as a lever in order to enhance service at Dulles. That is not something with which BWI can compete.

That kind of tie-in arrangement—I am not necessarily suggesting that it will be done explicitly. It may not even be done implicitly. The people in this business are smart people. I do not think anyone denies that. It is a highly competitive business. The people involved know what they are doing. They know the lay of the land. They know the score, so to speak. It will not be necessary to spell it out. But, obviously, if you are very anxious to get into Washington National, to get into sole of those slots, and this authority is running both National and Dulles and has a full-blown campaign on to get airlines to put service into Dulles, I think the writing is pretty clearly on the wall regarding to what will occur.

That, we think, is unfair competition. We want competition. We welcome it. We strongly support Dulles going into the hands of Virginia. Let Virginia take it over and try to develop it, and let us break this connection between Dulles and National which raises all the possibilities for unfair competition. That makes sense.

Second, dispose of these assets at some figure that makes sense to the Federal Government, rather than a bargain basement give-away, which is what has come before us.

I know that the Secretary is anxious to dispose of this responsibility and to devolve it elsewhere; but it has to be done, I think, in a way that makes sense. I do not believe that has happened in this legislation.

I turn now to the noise question, to which I alluded earlier.

Because of an amendment added late in the consideration of this measure—in fact, after the bill had been reported—the authority for controlling the noise question has been shifted from the FAA to the authority.

The noise issue has been a pressing issue, and anyone who lives in the Washington area, in the flight path or anywhere near the flight path into National Airport, knows how pressing this issue has been.

In fact, I have been joined in the past in working with my colleagues in Virginia with respect to the noise problem. We have been aligned together on a number of occasions in trying to control the noise problem, to place some controls on the number of passengers using National, and trying to maintain effective limits on noise produced by flights in and out of that airport. It has been a difficult struggle, with some advances and then some setbacks.

The present situation is that there is now in effect a curfew at National which limits flights to landing before 10 p.m. and after 7 a.m. In other words, there is a curfew between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m., although certain so-called quiet jets are allowed to land under certain circumstances after the curfew hours have gone into effect.

As we all know, National Airport is located in the center of one of the largest metropolitan areas in this country. Jets coming into National airport are required to follow an unusual landing and takeoff pattern, which stipulates that they must follow the Potomac River to minimize the impact of noise on the highly populated areas surrounding the airport.

Even under current circumstances, because of the peculiar geography and the twists and turns of the Potomac River and the turning points at which pilots leave the landing and takeoff patterns to head for their destination, Marylanders are much more affected by airplane noise than those citizens living in Virginia or the District of Columbia.

However, at least at present the hours of operation and the flight patterns are set by the Federal Aviation Administration and they have from time to time been reviewed by Congress.

So, as difficult as the problem, is, at least the current judgment on how to deal with it is made by the FAA at a level removed from State interest.

If the FAA is playing fair and square, you are not going to get preference for one State over another, I mean, one assumes hopefully, and I think, it has generally been the case, that they will make their judgments on other bases: the impact of the noise, the safety patterns, proper flight patterns, reasonable hours; and not come at it from the point of view of, well, whose ox is being gored the most in this situation.

The bill before us today, S. 1017, would make drastic changes in that procedure. An amendment was added at the last minute in committee, and I am quoting now from the legislative history in the report from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, accompanying S. 1017:

On April 26, 1985, Senators WARNER, TRIBLE, and DANFORTH introduced S. 1017, the Metropolitan Washington Airports Transfer Act of 1985 at the request of the administration.

With all due respect to my colleagues from Virginia, if I had been from Virginia, I would have introduced this legislation as well. It is a terrific bonanza. So I do not in the least fault them for introducing it. I think it is more than understandable that they would do so.

On June 26 and July 11, 1985, the Subcommittee on Aviation held hearings on the transfer proposal.

On September 11, 1985, the committee ordered the text of S. 1017 reported by vote of 12 to 4 after agreeing to an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Bear in mind that the independent airport authority created by this legislation, to which full responsibility for regulating aircraft noise at National was transferred by this late-starting amendment, is dominated by Virginia with 5 of the 11 members of the authority. Maryland has only two members of that authority. The District has three. The President puts on one. So Virginia and one other can in effect make the decision on this critical issue.

With the airport authority controlling the hours of operation and thus effectively controlling the issue of airplane noise, I do not think it unreasonable for Marylanders to be apprehensive that they are going to receive the brunt of the noise generated by planes landing and taking off from National Airport.

On November 14, 1985, that is 2 months later, after the bill was reported out from the committee, the committee ordered reported by voice vote a committee amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute previously ordered reported.

This committee amendment would transfer to the independent airport authority created by this legislation full responsibility for regulating airport-aircraft noise at National.

Let me just repeat that:

This committee amendment would transfer to the independent airport authority created by this legislation full responsibility for regulating airport-aircraft noise at National.

I would recognize the same point if the numbers were reversed and the problem were being asserted by other parties. In other words, you have taken the problem, put it under the authority, whose membership is heavily weighted, allowing it to impose the burdens of the operation of that airport on the jurisdiction underrepresented in the authority.

This is not a small problem. Those of us who represent people who live in this area, and I think the Delegate from the District of Columbia and I think the Congressmen and the Senators from Virginia, would concede that the noise impact on constituents is a severe problem and one that we have to contend with as a very real issue confronting our people. There has always been the difficulty in working out the sort of balance between the operation of National Airport and the impact on the constituents, putting on a curfew that is plainly controversial. The airlines did not want to do it. Drew Lewis developed a regional policy in that regard.

So I say to the membership this change only further complicates this matter.

In the findings section of S. 1017, the bill states, and I quote, on page 26 of S. 1017:

• • • an operating authority with representation from local jurisdictions, similar to authorities at all major airports in the United States, will improve communications with local officials and concerned residents regarding noise at the Metropolitan Washington Airports; • • •

It is my view, Madam President, that this simply will not happen in any balanced way given the unbalanced makeup of the airport authority in this bill.

Madam President, I realize that this is not an issue on which Members have focused, and I realize that on first blush it seems to simply carry with it a parochial squabble between Maryland and Virginia.

But I submit to the membership that the issues are far more grave and severe than appears on first impression.

First of all, as the distinguished Senator from South Carolina pointed out, you have the entire question of whether to undertake this transfer at all. And there are strong arguments to be made on both sides of that.

Second, you then have the question that, if the transfer is to be made, under what terms and conditions? The Federal Government currently has two very important and valuable assets. When the Governor of Maryland testified before the committee, he said he would pay double—double—for these airports what Virginia was being called upon or what the authority was being called upon to pay under the bill. I use the term Virginia and the authority almost interchangeably. That is not quite correct. But I do that in part because of the very predominant position Virginia holds on this authority.

And the Governor said that he would double—double—what the Federal Government was otherwise going to get from the transfer of these airports. Maryland has a very successful record in running an airport in BWI. They have done very well indeed at BWI over the years. In fact, Maryland is very proud of what they have managed to do at Baltimore-Washington International Airport. We have competed very effectively for passengers and cargo as well as for carriers and services.

Maryland made the decision to compete when they purchased BWI in 1972 and then launched a major capital improvement program, inaugurated aggressive sales and marketing initiatives to attract passengers and freight, and commenced the process of air service development, introducing new carriers and flights to the marketplace. They made effective use of airport moneys available from the Federal Government.

But I think on balance, it is fair to say that BWI achieved its status as a major air transportation facility the old-fashioned way—we earned it through hard work and prudent expenditure of funds.

During the difficult period of terminal expansion and modernization, Maryland enjoyed the support and cooperation of the carriers serving BWI, as well as the passengers and shippers convenienced by the use of Maryland's facility. Maryland showed it was not afraid to compete by making BWI an international gateway. Maryland was very much involved in gaining London routes, European routes, and is now the premier international airport in the region.

It has met the challenges of a competitive marketplace and continues to be prepared to meet the challenges of a competitive marketplace. But Maryland does not feel it should be placed at these competitive disadvantages, with an airport authority heavily weighted to Virginia, with the facilities conveyed to the authority at virtually no cost.

As I said, the Governor simply threw out at the meeting that he would double the price. Actually, the price ought to be far higher than that if you are talking about any essential fairness to the Federal taxpayer.

We confront the ability of these airports to cross-subsidize, which means that National can be used to underwrite Dulles and therefore enhance Dulles' competitive position vis-a-vis BWI. If Dulles can develop on its own an enhanced, competitive position vis-a-vis BWI, all praise to them. That is what it ought to be all about. But for them to be able to do it because they are being underwritten by Washington National Airport or because the authority can use the control of both airports and the desirability of slots at National and the difficulty of obtaining them as a leverage to enhance service at Dulles, we think is unfair.

And then, of course, I have talked at some length about the noise problem and how the incidence of that can be shifted in a very unfair way.

I have other points I wish to make, but I see my distinguished colleague from South Carolina has returned and in fact the proponents of the legislation may in fact want to make some comments about it. I think it is important to try to get into the RECORD, so our colleagues have an opportunity to review it, as much material as we can, so they will have a chance to go over it and begin to acquaint themselves in some detail with the issues that are involved.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Madam President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland. He has covered this extremely well and in detail. I would like to add a few things, though, that do not ordinarily come out in the normal consideration. What you have here is a many study operation, both at National and Dulles.

And watching the safety factors, of which we have all become concerned with at all airports, we watch particularly the one at National. Anyone who has flown in and out and knows anything about the takeoff and clearance schedules given—both private and general aviation, as well as the commercial lines—will understand in a second that National has, pretty well like Kansas City, gone about as far as she can go. What we have is an imposed cap of some 16 million passengers and a cap of some 37 landings and takeoffs per hour.

Now that was imposed by the Secretary of Transportation after very thorough observation and conferring with the operators at the airport, the particular air controllers, the FAA, and its safety requirements and everything else of that kind. She did this because there have been some near misses. Not due to traffic, of course, but on account of the freeze, the Air Florida crash itself, the pressure, I would take it.

We are thinking now in terms of the shuttle flight. And it has boiled down, it is very interesting, to every day they keep coming back to the O-ring problem. And the distinguished Presiding Officer and myself are both very much concerned about that. But that was not anything new. The O-ring problem on the shuttle was one that had been observed and declared dangerous.

One term of art of particular reference and classification was that by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. They call it a criticality I. In a criticality I, there was no backup. If that particular item in the equipment experienced a failure, that would cause the failure of the particular flight and perhaps the loss of the lives of the crew itself. So the O-ring problem was criticality I. And there had been a burn-through of the primary O-ring, and almost totally through the secondary, in January 1985—over a year before the tragic crash we had.

Now we go into the proposition of why the pressure to launch over the objection of the contractors. There are certain guidelines and processes that we as Senators are responsible for and the commission making the investigation is responsible for. I have made a very important distinction in my mind, having tried several cases before. When you say the process is flawed, the feeling thereon is that, just like a flaw in the cloth or flaw in the metal, something unforeseen that sneaked in could not be observed. Whereas, if the process is violated, that is the violation of an observed deficiency, and this is the latter in my judgment.

We observed the O-ring failure in January 1985. We came back and had a letter in the midsummer from witness Cook—in July of last year. We thereupon went into studies in August, and had several high level conferences. So concerned were they that in November of last year, when they had an automotive engineering conference with automotive engineers, the space engineer said, "well, maybe the automotive engineers have an approach that we have not tried." So they attended the automotive engineering conference here in Washington trying to solve it.

Of course, on the afternoon of January 27 and in that evening when the cold weather set in, the responsible engineer, McDonald of Morton Thiokol, said "No; I am not signing off." This is unsafe. And they went 2,000 miles uprange to overrule him at the personnel office. Again, the next morning he said you have got the written permission but I would implore you to wait until afternoon when it warms up. They still would not wait, and a separate engineering authority, namely Rockwell, at the Cape, also went to the launch authorities and said it was unsafe. And the authorities said, "Well, I thought he was expressing a concern and not an objection."

So in two instances we had contractors saying it was unsafe, and we had it overruled. In no instance in history of a launch have we had a contractor say it is unsafe, and thereby the launch occurring as a result of overruling the unsafe admonition.

They have been awfully careful. They had a dust storm all the way out.

Mr. WARNER. Madam President, will the distinguished Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. Madam President, as the manager of the bill, Mr. TRIBLE and myself will determine at the appropriate time to go forward on this bill when the proponents of the bill have within their rights exercised whatever proportionate time they still desire to debate the present pending motion to proceed. And by distinguished colleague from Maryland, who stepped aside the floor momentarily, sort of invited reply to the several points he raised.

Indeed, Mr. TRIBLE and I are prepared to reply to his inquiries at the appropriate time when the bill is before the Senate, and the Senate is permitted to work its will.

I say to my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, could he inform the Senate about the desire of the opponents of this bill and the relevance as to the flight of the space capsule, and also the Air Florida crash, because we are anxious, I think, to proceed with the formal consideration of this bill.

(Mr. SIMPSON assumed the chair.)

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, does the Senator not want me to talk about the space shuttle?

Mr. WARNER. No; the Senator is free. As a matter of fact, I rather enjoy listening to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I want to make an analogy.

That pressure could have come from the Congress inadvertently, I might add, but as sure as it would have been pressure by way of budget, by way of trying to justify the increases that they thought necessary in order to get the space station in place and keep the program up to snuff.

I heard the statement made by my colleague over on the House side. I am going to make the analogy right here. We might be starting pressure on NASA with this particular authority. I will make the analogy. But I want everyone to understand it is real. It is not imaginary. My colleague on the House side just the week before last asked Dr. Graham about the particular future of the program on commercial flights. He said Congress was unanimously in favor of the continued role of NASA for commercial flights for the space shuttle. That is not true. It is not unanimous at all. Over here on the Senate side we think this is a research project. And I think, rather than not bringing the pressure, that yes, when a leading member of the Space Committee in the National Congress jumps all over the Director, the message is clear and the Director says, "I had better keep it going, I had better keep a number of flights in the air, and keep up a schedule that would warrant commercial availability."

That is pressure. I happen to think, Senator, it was unusual pressure on the tragic morning of January 28. It was not any customary launch schedule pressure. It was unusual pressure to cause them to overrule two of the contractors who said it was unsafe to launch. That is wherein we have let the case get cold. I am not going into that unless you want to. I will be glad to go into that because we have been stonewalled. The Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee, of which I am the ranking member on the minority side, has been stonewalled from having any hearings. The people of America think that we have a responsibility. You and I know the responsibility for oversight. They are trying to finesse now, and trying to get budget figures out of us, but do not want to hear anything about the tragedy itself.

That is the only way we can determine the budget, the direction, and what happens with our Space Program—we must get into the cause and exactly what occurred. There have been hundreds and hundreds of people who have gone into the technical difficulties. But there has been hardly a field investigator go over to NASA and ask the head: "Who did you call?" "When did you call?" And if anybody in this National Congress believes that they can send a member from NASA saying "look, Mr. President, when you make your talk to the joint Congress on the evening of January 28, please refer to Christa McAuliffe"—the teacher in space, which the President himself launched. And if anybody believes—this Senator does not—that they just took that particular reference, just threw it aside, and nobody ever looked at it again—but they thought it significant enough to talk about a science test on the Challenger flight and not Christa McAuliffe on that Challenger flight—anybody who believes that is whistling Dixie. I can tell you that right now. They are not going to make this Senator believe and disregard that they never even thought of that. We are looking at the unusual pressure.

I have tried to get the telephone logs. I am trying to find out exactly what occurred so that we can settle it for once and for all. But I am not allowed to have the field investigators. I am not allowed by the majority of the Commerce Committee to continue in our particular hearings that we had. We are in a catch-22 situation.

The chairman of the committee says if we find fault with the Rogers Commission, then we will have a hearing. That makes me have to find fault in order to do my work.

Secretary Rogers comes up and he says I am not going to give you anything. So I cannot find fault or good. I just cannot find. So I cannot do my job.

But pressure begins right here in the National Congress in these things. It can begin in the agencies through overzealous interests. In this particular case, there is, yes, a local interest involved here with respect to making money, not necessarily safety. Airport authorities have got to make money. These authorities, I know, right now are making the money. They are getting a good windfall and everything else of that kind. But you never can tell what the economic pressures are. As now indicated in the findings that I referred to earlier, they said, yes, we would freeze the number of slots or landings there at National to 37 per hour. We eliminated the passenger cap. We unfroze that particular cap to allow them all to come in.

What effect does that have on the airport at National? Immediately that says bring in the bigger planes and let go the smaller planes. Immediately that is a particular pressure brought in general aviation. I was hailed by the general aviation groups, inadvertently, I guess, for the posture that I had taken in the very early instance because they said, no, we cannot go along with that. We will not be able to land the planes because with that cap removed, they will go to all commercial and we would not be able to land a single general aviation flight. They will do away with the facility out there. It would not pay for itself. Up to a point, then they got together with the distinguished Senator from Virginia, Senator TRIBLE, and with the arrangement they made with him, I think Senator TRIBLE took care of those concerns or Senator WARNER did. We will hear from the Senator later on that score.

But I know general aviation opposed this particular bill in the very early stages, and opposed it very vigorously. Now they have been made very happy. I want to learn later on why or how they were made happy. But back to pressure.

Pressure brought on National Airport is one issue that really borders on a hairline ruling out there at the present moment with respect to safety. We know we cannot get in any more landings and takeoffs. It is physically impossible, with the controllers, the space and they use cross-runways and different other things in there to bring them in as best they can. But now they say you cannot handle the passengers. And in this particular initiative they eliminate the passenger cap.

They also had the matter of the noise level. That amendment was due for defeat in the Commerce Committee, and, in fact, temporarily held up my the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia, and later offered and acted upon with respect to the noise level.

I wonder with all of these concerns whether we really are improving—as the Washington Post said in its editorial—whether we really are improving the public service there, or are we putting it in jeopardy in contrast to a public service?

Mr. President, I want to go to the undervaluation of the sale price.

The Department of Transportation sale price of $47 million is to be repaid over the next 35 years. It is too low. In fact, the revenues coming in and everything else of that kind means they will really have a financial kitty to operate on, rather than just pay back. And we, the users, will be paying double for that particular service we have been receiving.

The National Taxpayers Union estimated the fair market value of the facilities at $1.5 billion.

The Grace Commission, when they put their value on it, had it at more than $300 million. I remember back under President Richard Nixon, it was $170 million. It hit me when we had the $47 million figure used that this particular "Holton Fix" got it at $47 million and got a sweetheart deal with the administration in their notion to take over.

They really had it arranged because they were buying at least $300 million and probably double that amount for $47 million.

The General Accounting Office, using the Department of Transportation accounting records and evaluation techniques, found another $61 million had been excluded. Even using the Department of Transportation's undervalued pricing system, which no one endorses, it should be at least $108 million, not $47 million.

Maryland's Governor, Governor Hughes, testified at the hearing that he would double the $47 million figure and pay $94 million if he could get hold of those facilities right now.

Why is it that we are really stonewalled, in a sense, with this particular low price? They will not accept any amendments at all on that score. If we do, why should we even pay more because then we will have to want more bonds and if we want more bonds then instead of the $250 million we will want $350 million? Then, instead of $712 million, we really are talking about a $1 billion cost to the users of National and Dulles. This is added cost to their operations for no reason at all on top of what they have already paid to go ahead and get these approvals.

Mr. President, I cannot see how they can sneak it by. I guess that is why we are here objecting to bringing it up for consideration. We are really jammed with a lot of important matters—too important to bother with a couple of airports which do not deserve, frankly, the time of the U.S. Senate for more than a half-hour at the most. The Members themselves are all boiled up with respect to Contra aid, with respect to the deficit, with respect to tax reform and all the other particular initiatives. Everybody out in the hinterland has been told that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings has cut their programs so they have come to Washington and once again they want to see the devil put into Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. You cannot possibly see all the people who want to come and talk to you to tell you of the worth of their particular program.

In the meantime, we come here with an attempt to resolve a very important problem. The problem is a made problem. It is a politically made problem. If we did not have this particular bill in, if we only had a request, we would approve it in the Budget Committee with a line just going across there, allocating the amounts. And the Federal Aviation Administration could immediately go to getting the bids on the particular improvements, awarding those bids and supervising the improvements as the particular facilities were being constructed.

No authority has constructed anything at National. No authority has constructed and operated anything at Dulles. We now have the Government ready, willing, and able to move forward, and we have the money within the Government. It has always been a matter of puzzlement to me where we are constantly taking money into the trust funds that we have and not spending it, while enacting new and different initiatives, and borrowing in order to finance those particular initiatives. Crudely expressed, we do not spend the money we got and we do spend the money we don't got.

We have moneys in the highway fund. Just two Christmasses ago we had a jobs bill of $5 billion. We had over $10 billion unexpended in the highway trust fund. We could have given everybody a job. But it could not be expended, save on highways. But, no, do not spend that. We could not get anyone's attention on that one. We have to borrow $5 billion in order to get jobs where we already had $10 billion in the highway fund which could have been used for the same purposes.

Now we come with the money we have in the trust fund having been paid. That is a surplus amount. There is such a thing in Washington as a surplus. They ought to go out and take a picture of it as an endangered species and put it in the Smithsonian. We already have the money allocated. But now we are going to have the $4 billion sit there unallocated and we will put out some more tax-exempt bonds and the tax expenditure costs will exceed some $300 million to the taxpayers.

I cannot see for me how we can continue on with this particular initiative. I would hope that the leader will respond to the Washington Post. I know he is not responding to any pressure in the family or anything of that kind. But the Washington Post is pushing.

The airport trust fund was created for the modernization and development of airports and the aircraft control system. The current trust fund balance is $7.7 billion.

I just received these figures from the Congressional Budget Office and from our Budget Committee.

The surplus is expected to reach more than $4 billion at the end of this fiscal year of 1986. Why not use the money we have and spend that on National and Dulles rather than spending money that we do not have?

As I stated before, there are many other airports that have shared in this without any debate on the floor of the U.S. Congress. The administration asked for and was immediately given that $150 million for Dallas-Fort Worth. When the administration asked for the $100 million in Atlanta, $90 million for a runway in St. Thomas, they immediately responded.

Our problem here is that we have not even been asked, and my problem here is that I cannot ask because Gramm-Rudman-Hollings says you have to have a zero sum amendment, or find $250 million, when in reality I know I have the $250 million in the trust fund right now waiting to be expended for airport improvement.

I want to talk a little bit about the proposed representation on the regional authority, Mr. President. I said earlier that the New York Port Authority had a veto, they had equal representation on the authority from New York and New Jersey. Each Governor had a signoff and somewhat like the United Nations, and with a veto they could survive. Now, in reality, the State of Virginia is given that veto with five members from Virginia, only three from the District and two from Maryland, and one appointed by the President. There is not any question that that is going to be one of the great commitments that is easily given.

If you have ever run for President, you know you have these people come along with their particular interests. They are talking to the candidates and if they are smart enough, they will ask every candidate—Republican, Democrat, obscure like myself and winning candidates like the President himself and Vice President Mondale—"There is a little thing there in Virginia, we are very much concerned about the operation of these two airports and we would like to have a signoff on your appointee."

You say, "Why I would give it consideration." You do not make a commitment. That is against the law for anybody running for President, but you make that representation very easily.

If I were the governing authority of Virginia, I would make an inquiry of the candidates as they all came through and then when the election came up, we would have our five plus one, you would have the six. You would have the veto and you would run. You would listen to the other people if they were pleasant and agreeable. You might even get some who were very agreeable in the District.

But looking at some of the appointments we have to rule on from time to time in the Senate, I cannot look for any hope that anybody is really going to be interested other than in the title of this particular situation.

So we are going to have a Virginia veto, no doubt, with respect to the makeup of this particular authority. I would certainly want, if I have 40 percent, the four rather than the three that I have from the District of Columbia. But I am only given the three and the two from Maryland here, then one appointed by the President. That puts me in a bad position.

The airports do not belong to Virginia, Maryland, or the District. We should not be transferring the responsibility from Washington to Annapolis or to Richmond. But that is what is really occurring in Congress today. We are going to take the airports down there at Washington, the Capital, which is anathema to the Virginia government anyway. Those things, jealousy and competition and disdain, build up in every particular State and they think that we look too much at the Federal problems, with Federal employees and everything else, and are not that much interested in the welfare of the Commonwealth. Then, when the welfare of the Commonwealth comes forward and there are needs there and adjustments to be made, it would be very, very easy to transfer those needs and adjustments to impact upon the Dulles properties or the National Airport.

I could see very well, if I served on that authority and I had a chance to get a big factory out there at Dulles—3,000 acres—and I am making an industrial park and I can see where we might need even again some further runway development or what-have-you—or an industrial park coming out to Virginia—I would say I would opt for jobs, opt for industrial power—let us put the building there and let us put the facilities there and let them all land.

If industry came along and said, "Look, if you landed them all one way, I could put this big industry there," the temptation would be great. You are sitting in Richmond and you are looking for industry. You want to point at what you did. You cannot run for Governor of Virginia and get reelected on the proposition that you got some more landings at Dulles or improved the service at Dulles. They would run you off the campaign track in the Commonwealth of Virginia running on that particular platform. So what you are really going to do is take the people's facilities and transfer them over to Richmond's political nuances and needs and turn, perhaps, an airport authority into an industrial development authority.

I could well imagine, with the airport authority having all this prime industrial property out there, that the tail could wag the dog in that particular instance and thereupon, we would just, unknowingly, resolve into industrial development rather than airport service.

I think this thing is fraught with more dangers and wastes and costs than we can possibly imagine, Mr. President. It is a bad initiative at a bad time. I guess what they are saying is we could use the $47 million today here, in 1986 to help with the deficit, but that is our trouble now. We want to transfer the bill to the next generation to pay. We have been buying votes with the fruits of the next generation.

Mr. President, I hope we will continue to give this very serious consideration and perhaps reject it, because the people from Maryland have not been treated fairly on this one. The people from the District of Columbia have not been treated fairly on it. The people of the United States have not been treated fairly on it.

I have a note here, I say to the Senator from Maryland that the Budget Committee is going to have two votes at 2:35, so if I could be excused momentarily, I want to continue later with the debate and the presentation that the Senator from Maryland is making on this score. Since we do not have a proxy rule in the Budget Committee of the U.S. Senate, I would like to attend those two votes. I think they could be needed in order to get this vote out this afternoon and then rejoin the Senator on the floor.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia and the distinguished Senator from Maryland for their courtesy in listening to my deep concerns. I am going to come back later and describe safety a little bit more so everyone will understand it with respect to the pressures we bring on unsafe operations here, right at the beginning of the national Congress.

I thank the distinguished Senators here and I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the quorum call now in progress be discontinued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HELMS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Maryland has reappeared on the floor, and I am wondering if at this time we might engage in a colloquy such that we could better inform the other Members of the Senate about the progress of this bill. The proponents, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. TRIBLE] and myself, are quite anxious to proceed and join in the issues raised by the distinguished Senator from Maryland, but we determined that it was best to await the Senate's formal consideration of the bill. The Senator from Maryland at this time, together with other colleagues, has discussed the merits of proceeding, so I wonder if at this time we could ask of the Senator from Maryland any advice he might give the managers of the bill, together with other Senators, as to the progress we might hope to make.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. WARNER. I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, as I indicated to the distinguished Senators from Virginia, of course Senator HOLLINGS had to go back to the Budget Committee for some votes and intends to return and continue on this matter further. While I made an opening statement, there are some elaborations that I also wish to make. There are also other Members, we believe, who want to have a chance to speak, although they are now tied up, so I am not sure exactly when they will get here. I do not know whether either of the Senators from Virginia wants to speak on the matter. It would seem to me they might want to so that material and debate is available in the RECORD in the morning for our colleagues as they consider this. I am coming more and more to think, as we debate the issue, that the Members probably ought to perceive the motion to proceed as really raising the question whether this matter is in a sufficiently proper state for the Senate to go to it. In other words, a lot of difficulties have been pointed out and underscored.

We have two problems. One is whether, given the current state of this legislation—in fact, I think the disarray, from my point of view, would be the more accurate term to use—whether, given the current disarray, it is something the Senate wants to address.

As I indicated earlier, many positive and constructive ideas were put forward along the way in considering this, but none of them was picked up. For a lot of reasons, the Senate may decide this issue needs further work, if in fact the Senate decides that it wants to take it up. If the matter is indeed taken up, there is a range of amendments, as I understand, to be proposed, on a whole variety of issues. Of course, that would then raise, conceivably, an entirely different question, at the end of that deliberation.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield.

Mr. TRIBLE. It is the opinion of the Senators from Virginia that debate on the merits should await the Senate turning to this bill. We look forward to a lively and thorough debate.

We have listened very carefully and attentively to the discussions of the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from South Carolina. I hope now that the Senator from Maryland will permit the Senate to proceed to the actual consideration of this measure.

I ask the Senator what his intentions are. Is it his intention to permit us to proceed to a debate—to turn formally to the matter at hand?

Mr. SARBANES. Certainly not today. As I indicated earlier in my statement, I thought it important that our colleagues have the benefit of the discussion that is going on here—in the RECORD in the morning—to review, and for their staffs to review, and begin to gain a sense of what the issues are that are at stake here.

It was in that context that I was suggesting that the Senator might want to address it. I am perfectly ready to go on with some other points I want to make. I do have the view that this should be available in the morning, in the RECORD, for Members and their staffs to examine, so that they can factor these considerations into their judgment, if and when we reach the decision on whether to proceed.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I am sure that our colleagues wait expectantly for tomorrow's RECORD, to follow our discussions about this measure.

Mr. SARBANES. If they do, it would probably be a first.

Mr. TRIBLE. I suspect that my colleague from Maryland is correct in that judgment.

If it is the Senator's intention to continue his discussion at this point, then it would be my intention to sit here and listen.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, earlier we talked about the Grace Commission and the fact that this matter was included in the Grace Commission report.

I understand that the Grace Commission has done some backsliding on this issue in the interim, and one can understand that. There are a lot of pressures of one sort or another at work.

One never knows what may move people to come to a somewhat different perspective at a later time. But I think it is important to include in the record their consideration of these Metropolitan Washington airports.

When they were talking about the sale of the airports, they considered the question whether they should be sold, and at what price. Their conclusion was that the potential revenue from the sale of Washington National and Dulles International Airports would result in a one-time Federal revenue acceleration of $341 million.

They indicated in their report that there were three basic approaches to implement an appraisal of a capital asset: One, replacement cost; two, capitalization of projected cash flow; three, market value, the price at which a willing seller and a willing buyer arrive.

They went on to say:

Because airports are unique in several aspects, chiefly their nonprofit status, capitalization of projected cash flow is not a valid approach. Neither is "market value," because of the near absence of other comparable transactions.

The land component of an airport can be valued in terms of replacement cost, but this approach has limited relevance. The value of similar land outside the airport reflects the present value of expected cash flows from uses which generally do not occur at an airport. Structures at an airport also tend to be unique and unlikely to have alternative uses that would have a comparable value if the property were sold.

Having, in effect, disposed of these three basic approaches by those comments, they then went on to say:

Consequently, in this issue three other techniques are used to update earlier appraisals that have been made:

Adjust to 1982 constant dollars by using the Gross National Product (GNP) price deflator, the appraised value of the MWA in 1972, and any capital improvements since 1972;

Calculate the ratio of the 1972 appraised market value to the 1972 net book value of the MWA land and buildings. Assuming this same market value-to-book value ratio exists in 1982, multiply this ratio times the MWA 1982 net book value of land and buildings.

Calculate the ratio of the 1978 appraised market value to 1978 net book value of Burbank Airport land and buildings.

They use Burbank because there was a sale that took place in Burbank, CA, from a private party to a public agency.

This report then goes on:

Assuming this same market value-to-book value ratio exists in 1982, multiply this ratio times the MWA 1982 net book value of land and buildings.

They then go on to take these three techniques, which they have outlined in an effort to ascertain the price; I am not now necessarily endorsing this approach or any particular one of these techniques. I am really setting it out here so Members can have the benefit of the analysis by the Grace Commission, and so they will see more clearly the enormous disparity in evaluations made by the Commission, made by the Taxpayers Union, and made by others with respect to what is a reasonable price to be paid for these facilities; and so they will understnad the virtual giveaway price at which Secretary Dole and the Department are seeking to obtain here in the course of transferring it to this airport authority.

The Grace Commission, the so-called President's private sector on cost control, goes on to say, with respect to the three techniques for appraisal just set out, the following, and I quote:

"Alternative appraisals: valuation based on GNP price deflator. In 1972, an independent audit of the MWA—" metropolitan Washington airports, and that is National and Dulles combined—they are collectively known in the terminology of this report as the MWA—"land and buildings determined the fair market value to be $105 million. Assuming no depreciation, the 1982 yearend constant dollar value would be $217.5 million. Add to this any capital appropriations adjusted to reflect fiscal year 1982 yearend dollars. The result is a total value of $318.4 million."

So using this first approach, they conclude the result is a total value of $318.4 million.

They then go on to take the second approach. They say: "Alternative appraisals: valuation based on a multiple of book value from the Burbank Airport valuation. When the Burbank Airport was appraised to find the fair market value of its land and buildings in 1978, the ratio of market to book value was 4.77 times. Multiplying the metropolitan Washington airport, September 30, 1982."—of course we are now using somewhat dated figures, 1982—"land and buildings net book value—after accumulated depreciation of $80.4 million by 4.77 yields $383.5 million. The book value of construction in process is assumed to be equal to the market value. The total value of the MWA's land and buildings after adding $30.2 million construction in process is $413.7 million."

So now we use one alternative appraisal method and they came in with a figure of $318.4 million. Bear in mind now that what the Department of Transportation was saying was $47 million to be paid over a 35-year period. That is the level at which the proposition before us finds itself, well under $100 million.

Yet here the first appraisal method is $318.4 million, the second appraisal method is $413.7 million, and the third method, and I now quote from the report, "Valuation based on a multiple of book value from the MWA's valuation in 1972. When the MWA's land and buildings were valued at $105 million in 1972, the net book value of these assets was $32.2 million." In other words, they took the 1972 valuation and then compared it with a book value and came up with a factor of 3.26. "This results in a market to book multiple of 3.26 times. Multiplying the MWA's land and building net book value of $80.4 million by 3.26 and adding $30.2 million in construction in process gives $292.3 million."

So now we have been through three appraisal methods used by the President's Private Sector on Cost Control Commission. One method put a total value on of $318.4 million; another, $413.7 million; and a third one, $292.3 million.

As I indicated, I do not vouch for any one of these methods. I think a strong case can be made that the figure should indeed be much higher, and I spoke earlier of the amount of land that was being transferred to Dulles, the thousands of acres, and the value that attached to it.

But the Grace Commission went on to say in their summary: "The three estimates of the fair market value of the MWA land and buildings range from $292.3 million to $413.4 million. The mean value is $314.5 million, which will be used in further calculations for purposes of simplicity."

So the value that they attached on this sale of the two airports was $341.5 million.

Yet the figure that was put forward by the Department of Transportation was $47 million. As I indicated, the Governor of Maryland came in before the committee and said he would double the price right on the spot. He was prepared to double the price.

So it is clear that these assets are being disposed of at far, far below anything that begins to approximate their reasonable value. They in effect are being given away.

There is no wonder the State of Virginia and its two able and distinguished Members in this body are so anxious to move this legislation along. They are going to be running all the way to the bank. It seems to me that the great deal or steal of 1986, needs some careful attention and focus by the Members of this body.

(Mr. TRIBLE assumed the Chair.)

Mr. SARBANES. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina had to leave the floor for the very pressing budget problems in the Budget Committee. It is not as though the Nation were in a fiscal period when we could simply sort of shrug their shoulders and say, "Well, a few hundred million or less, what does it matter?"

I think it is reasonable to expect that if we are going to devolve ourselves of these assets that we ought to obtain a reasonable price for them.

We just went through that with the sale of Conrail, a proposal that came from the same Department and the same Secretary.

I think the Secretary is an able person and I have been struck by the many, many articles written about her which have made that point. I think she has shown a lot of skill as a member of the President's Cabinet.

But it seems to me we have to begin to question more closely this bargain basement operation being run over at the Department of Transportation.

When the Conrail proposal was here, in effect, there was an alternative bid at 50 percent above the price being offered by the party whom the Secretary supported, a reputable bid.

The Secretary, many thought at the time, had locked herself into a position and felt obligated to press forward with it. And, of course, the consequence was that what the Federal Government could have realized from the sale of Conrail to the private sector was substantially under what it could have gotten had the Secretary been prepared to be more flexible in that situation.

I am fearful that we have the same sort of situation at work here. The Senator from South Carolina was absolutely right earlier when he said that the Secretary set up this commission. She was anxious to shed the responsibilities of National Airport and Dulles Airport and not to carry them on at the Federal level. They have been uniquely the national airports now for many years. But she was anxious to get rid of them. And, in the end, she swallowed a deal that I take it she perceived as the only one she could get if the State of Virginia were to go along.

It is obvious why the State of Virginia will go along with this deal. Here you have three valuations, $318.4 million, $413.7 million, and $292.3 million. The mean value of them is $341.5 million, almost $350 million. Yet, the price the Department was talking about is $47 million. Now we are losing a quarter of a billion dollars, at least, on this proposition, just compared with these appraisals, let alone others.

I read earlier the letter from the National Taxpayers Union in which they state, and I am quoting beginning with the second paragraph:

> Although we agree that the Federal Government should get out of the business of owning and managing airports, we are appalled at the ridiculously low sale price placed on these valuable properties. The combined market value of the properties is conservatively estimated at $1.5 to $2 billion. Yet, the two airports are to be sold for only $47 million—about 1/35th their actual worth.
> In addition, the transfer and future improvements are to be financed with tax-exempt bonds over a 30-year period. This adds up to a double soaking of the taxpayer.
> Given the Nation's tremendous budget deficits and $2 trillion national debt, it is fiscally irresponsible for the Federal Government to do anything but seek fair market value for the airports. Sound policy demands that the price tag on Dulles and National be raised to reflect their true worth. Otherwise, the sale should be rejected.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the National Taxpayers Union letter be printed in the RECORD at this point and that the excerpt quoted from by the President's private sector on cost capital report on privatization also be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL TAXPAYERS UNION,
Washington, DC, March 18, 1986.

DEAR SENATOR: Soon you may be asked to vote on S. 1017, the Metropolitan Washington Airports Transfer Act. This bill would transfer ownership of Dulles and National Airports to an independent authority dominated by the Commonwealth of Virginia. We urge you to vote "NO" on this sale.

Although, we agree that the federal government should get out of the business of owning and managing airports, we are appalled at the ridiculously low sale price placed on these valuable properties. The combined market value of the properties is conservatively estimated at $1.5 to $2 billion. Yet, the two airports are to be sold for only $47 million—about 1/35 their actual worth.

In addition, the transfer and future improvements are to be financed with tax-exempt bonds over a 30-year period. This adds up to a double soaking of the taxpayer.

Given the nation's tremendous budget deficits and $2 trillion national debt, it is fiscally irresponsible for the federal government to do anything but seek fair market value for the airports. Sound policy demands that the price tag on Dulles and National be raised to reflect their true worth. Otherwise, the sale should be rejected.

Sincerely,

JILL LANCELOT,
Director, Congressional Affairs.

REPORT ON PRIVATIZATION

Summary. The three estimates of the fair market value of the MWA land and buildings range from $292.3 million to $413.4 million. The mean value is $341.5 million, which will be used in further calculations for purposes of simplicity.

(Mr. PRESSLER assumed the chair.)

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, the question of the price to be paid here is a question that involves, obviously, every Member since we are disposing of Federal assets and we are doing it here for virtually nothing—the figures range from $47 million to $300 million to over $1 billion, with incredibly valuable land at Dulles, thousands of acres also at issue.

If you look at the bill reported by the committee as to what the prices should be, you find it nowhere states a price. I invite the attention of the membership to the fact that what we have stated here is a very involved and complex formula without any way of knowing exactly what that means in dollar terms.

First of all, it is to be a lease, not a sale. In other words, the money is not to be received now in payment for the facilities. They have set an incredibly low cost and then you do not even get it in hand, you get it over 35 years. One has the sense that the Federal pockets are being picked here.

But the legislation says on page 29:

In consideration for the transfer of the Metropolitan Washington Airports, the Airports Authority shall make payments to or for the account of the United States, as specified in this subsection.

Basic lease payments sufficient to repay to the United States the amount of hypothetical indebtedness of the Metropolitan Washington Airports shall be made to the Treasury of the United States, as determined by the Federal Aviation Administration as of the date of transfer in accordance with appropriate Federal financial directives, and at the imputed interest rate for such indebtedness on that date, within 35 years. The Comptroller General of the United States shall conduct an audit of the Federal Aviation Administration's determination of hypothetical indebtedness, and shall also report on any costs incurred for the Metropolitan Washington Airports not included in such determination.

And then, the next section goes on to provide, "In addition to the consideration required for lease and acquisition in the metropolitan Washington airports under paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Airports Authority shall" pay certain moneys to the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund to represent certain costs connected with employees of the authority.

I see the distinguished Senator from Virginia on the floor. Perhaps he can tell me what this means in dollar terms. There is no dollar figure in this bill. It is a 35-year payment, the so-called amount of hypothetical indebtedness. Whatever the figure is, trying to puzzle through the committee's report, it is clearly a lot less than any of these other figures which have come before us as being reasonable for obtaining this airport.

Mr. TRIBLE. I look forward to responding to the points raised by my colleague. But, before we engage in that debate—a debate which quite properly should be reserved until the Senator from Maryland permits the Senate to turn to the consideration of this measure—I would like to point out that the Senator from Maryland and his colleague from South Carolina have shared their thoughts and concerns about this legislation since approximately 11:50 this morning. It would seem that my colleagues from Maryland has now had ample opportunity to instruct his colleagues. I ask if the Senator from Maryland would now permit the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this legislation

Mr. SARBANES. I indicated to the Senator earlier that I thought it was important for our colleagues to have the benefit of this analysis to review in the RECORD in the morning. This is not an issue, I think it is fair to say, on which Members have focused. They have tended not to see it as a highly controversial issue. It only indirectly affects the interests of many Members of this body, although I think upon analysis they will come to understand that it does in fact affect the taxpayer in a very vital way.

My own view is that as we probe into this further and further there are sufficient questions about even the basic merits of the legislation to raise the very serious point as to whether the Senate ought to spend its time in order to take it up.

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. SARBANES. Surely.

Mr. TRIBLE. Recognizing the right of a Senator to take time to share his thoughts and concerns in respect to this, will the Senator agree to a unanimous-consent agreement establishing a time certain at which the Senate can turn properly to this legislation?

Mr. SARBANES. No. The Senator is not prepared to do that at this point.

Mr. TRIBLE. I must observe that the Senator is really not engaging in debate but rather is filibustering, and is obstructing the process at a time when the Senate has a whole host of important matters, including this measure.

Mr. SARBANES. That may be the Senator's observation. I do not share it. I think that before we take this matter up, Members ought to appreciate the deficiencies connected with this legislation and then ask themselves. This question: Do we really even want to take it up? Is this not an issue on which some effort should first be made to address the range of objections which have been raised here, in effect to say to the Secretary, "Well, you really ought to go back and redraw this at the drafting board"?

We saw the same problem with Conrail. A lot of points were raised, and the Secretary said, "Well, you know, we made that decision way back then and now we have to sort of stick to it." That is exactly what is happening here. Let me give you one example.

A strong argument was made in the commission that Dulles could not sustain itself alone financially. Therefore, it had to be linked with National be able to draw on that underwrite from National, which we in Maryland think is very unfair to the competition between BWI and Dulles. I do not see how any reasonable observer could conclude otherwise.

Every other airport has to stand on its own. To link these two, and take a highly profitable one which is not BWI's competitor, and underwrite the other, which is BWI's competitor, is an unfair situation.

Since that analysis was made, a year and a half have passed. The activity at Dulles has increased tremendously over that period. In fact, there was a story in the Washington Post at the end of last year, last December, headlined "Fast Growth Strains Dulles Services." It went on to talk about how the tremendous increase in air traffic was placing a strain on the services.

That, of course, raises the question as to whether the financial analysis that was relied upon, or at least was used by some to argue for putting the two airports together financially, still stands. In the light of this development, it is reasonable to argue that the case for severing the financial connection between Washington National and Dulles Airport has been greatly strengthened. Dulles to stand on its own if that were the case, at least in the financial arena—up to a limited point, because you still have the giveaway of major assets. So they start off in effect almost with a free capital base—that is what it amounts to—for the competition we are talking about.

Maryland wants the competition but it wants it on a fair basis. It wants it on a fair basis. Maryland bought an airport and spent a quarter of a billion dollars improving it. We are prepared to compete with Virginia if it pays a reasonable fee for Dulles, and then seeks to improve it.

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes.

Mr. TRIBLE. The Senator has asserted on two occasions now that Maryland has spent a quarter of a billion dollars on BWI. I wonder if he might tell us about that expenditure. It certain is at odds with the figures presented to the Commerce Committee.

Mr. SARBANES. I said earlier—and I should have said there—that is adjusted for constant dollars. But let me read what Maryland says on that point.

"Maryland invested $36 million in State general funds in 1972 in acquiring Friendship Airport from Baltimore City. This represents some $100 million in today's dollars" inflated through the end of 1985. In other words, the authority is now going to acquire this facility not even in today's dollars. The authority is going to acquire this facility not even in today's dollars because the authority is going to have a lease, and pay for them over the next 35 years. So the comparison I am about to make is even more pointed than the figures I just used.

"Maryland invested $36 million in State general funds in 1972 in acquiring Friendship Airport from Baltimore City. This represents some $100 million in today's dollars."

In other words, adjusted for inflation through 1985.

If you bought it at the end of 1985 in 1985 dollars, and adjusted it from the figure paid in 1972, it would be $100 million.

"Additionally, Maryland invested almost $114 million in Maryland DOT funds on improving Baltimore-Washington International."

That is $114 million invested then at the dollar levels over the period 1972 to 1985—some early in that period, some in the middle, some at the end of that period.

"This represents some $180 million in today's dollars" adjusted for inflation.

So, "The current dollar investment of State funds is $280 million."

If you took what Maryland has put into BWI and brought it up to date, it is $280 million. This legislation proposes to give these two airports to this Airport Authority dominated by Virginia $47 million. That is not even in current prices.

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Surely.

Mr. TRIBLE. Even with the recomputation, I must point out the Senator's figures are incorrect. As the Senator said, Maryland paid $36 million to Baltimore to buy Friendship Airport. The Senator is now saying we are going to recompute those figures in today's value. Beyond that, the Senator has pointed out that $114 million came from the transportation fund of Maryland. The Congressional Research Service suggests it is actually $116 million.

These are State bonds bought against the Maryland Consolidated Transportation Trust Fund. These are not dollars drawn from the taxpayers of Maryland. These are moneys from the users of the highways and the airports of Maryland.

I will point out also that BWI has also benefited from $33 million through Federal AIP grants.

Mr. SARBANES. I was not counting that money.

Mr. TRIBLE. You did not count those moneys quite properly because they could not in the wildest of imagination be counted as drawn against the State of Maryland.

I think that all those figures suggest more precisely the funding of BWI.

I have resisted the temptation today to raise a number of points during the Senator's soliloquy because we will have that opportunity to debate once the Senator permits the Senate to turn to the consideration of this measure. However, I would point out that the Commerce Committee decided to reimburse the State of Maryland for the $36 million out-of-pocket expenditure for Friendship Airport.

Moreover, I would point out finally that the Commerce Committee, by a vote of 12 to 4, overwhelmingly supported this measure and found it was fair—fair to Maryland and in the best interests of all of our citizens. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. SARBANES. I appreciate the comments of the Senator from Virginia. I would point out that the money Maryland invested was Maryland money, not Federal airport improvement money. I was careful to leave that out. Those are moneys paid by Maryland.

Mr. TRIBLE. If the Senator will yield, these are dollars generated from all the users of the highways and airports in Maryland and not from Maryland's taxpayers.

Mr. SARBANES. If Virginia were doing this thing right, they would have the opportunity to make use of similar funds. The fact is that Maryland has put into this airport about $280 million in current funds. The Airports Authority is about to acquire these two airports for less than 20 percent of that, and then is not even going to pay that 20 percent up front. It is going to pay it over a 35-year period. It is incredible.

Mr. TRIBLE. If the Senator will yield, I do not want to really engage in debate at this point, so I will reserve my response to a more appropriate time for debate on the merits. That is when the Senator will permit the Senate to turn to the consideration of this measure.

My only purpose in rising at this particular point is to make sure there is no mistake in the record about the exact amounts of moneys involved here and where they came from. That, I think, has been accomplished.

Mr. SARBANES. I am pressing to make my point. The Senator is welcome to try to rebut it. I am happy to have him try to do that. The fact of the matter is that as part of this transfer the authority is going to get a federally funded access road for free, originally costing $60 million. What happens in this proposal to the Dulles access road built by the Federal Government at its expense? What happens to it is that it is transferred as another one of the assets going over to the Airports Authority, $60 million.

Definitions on page 28 of the bill: "Metropolitan Washington Airports," which is what is going to be transferred to the Airports Authority, is defined as:

"Means Washington National Airport and Washington Dulles International Airport, and includes the Dulles Airport access highway and right of way, including the extension between the interstate routes I-495 and I-66."

It is magnificent. I hope the Senator from Virginia goes back every night and says to his constituents, "Look at what we have pulled off here. Up there in Maryland they have this BWI, which they are trying to build up. In current dollars they have put in $280 million to get that facility to where it is today. Look, we are going to get two airports and a federally constructed access road at a cost, I am told, of $60 million at the time it was built, and we are going to get this thing for roughly $50 million. So we are going to set up this Airports Authority to compete and they are going to get all of this capital and all of these facilities and everything else for about $50 million. And they are not even going to pay it."

It is incredible.

As I told the Senator earlier when we were off the floor, the more I get into this thing, the more energized I become. It is incredible what is going on here.

There is a nice book called "The Great Train Robbery." This is providing us the grist for the mill, to just substitute "airport" for "train."

It is going to be paid as a lease over 35 years.

Not only do you have this tremendous disparity in the value that is being talked about, but then, despite this giveaway price, it is not even being paid for up front. It is going to be paid over 35 years.

By the time you discount it for inflation over the 35 year period, the figure is going to be a lot less than the $50 million we are talking about.

So if you compare what Maryland put in to get Baltimore-Washington International where it is, $280 million, the Virginia authority is now going to get two airports, both of them profitable—National very profitable, as we know; Dulles showing rapid improvement.

As I understand it, there are what—some 10,000 acres—at Dulles. Does the Senator quarrel with that figure? I take it not. Some 10,000 acres at Dulles, 2,000 of which can be developed and the best estimate is that they have a value of about $200 million.

Mr. President, where is the fairness to the Federal taxpayer in all of this? Some have argued here that the transfer ought not to happen at all, that the Federal Government ought to hold on to National and Dulles and to proceed from there. But if it is going to transfer and dispose of them, clearly, it ought to do so at a figure that contains within it some fairness for the Federal taxpayer. It is obviously for this reason that the National Taxpayers Union has sent us this very strong letter urging a no vote on this sale.

The reason I say to the Senator that we need to try to put these arguments on the record and have them considered is that I think Members, before they agree to go to this bill, ought to understand this. In fact, the membership might feel, "Well, we really think that the transfer ought to take place but we think these terms have not been carefully worked out. We think really that there ought to be an effort made to go back to the drawing board to reexamine the offers, to reexamine the arrangements by which this would happen; in other words, by what kind of authority can you split Dulles and National?"

I do not think that proposal was ever given the consideration it deserved. I agree with the observation made by my distinguished colleague from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS] earlier in the debate that the outcome was pretty well set the very moment the commission began to consider this matter. That was that both airports were going to be put in the same authority. It was precluded from considering whether all three airports should be brought into one authority. That is a complicated thing to do, but it may make a lot of sense if you are going to run an overall regional air transport program.

That was excluded from consideration.

No serious consideration, in my judgment, was given to the proposition, I think a positive and constructive one, that Dulles and National should be separated, the proposition of allowing National to be run by an authority embracing the three jurisdictions equally, with representation from the Federal Government, and allowing Dulles to go to the State of Virginia.

As you begin to look at these figures and the enormous discrepancies in them and begin to understand that this is really a fire sale, I think more and more Members may ask themselves, "Would it not be better to go back and try to work this thing out again, take another look at it?" The Secretary was unwilling to do that with Conrail, even though significantly improved offers had come in subsequent to her previous decision. There is a responsibility here, it seems to me, to the Federal Treasury and the Federal taxpayer which ought to motivate the Secretary and which requires a second look.

That is aside from the argument I have been making about trying to be equitable in terms of the competition between Maryland and Virginia and constructing an airport system in this area, in this region, that will work effectively.

In setting out the legislation, as I said earlier, Mr. President, it fails to spell out how much money we are talking about. I do not blame them for that. If they spelled the figure out, it would be so shocking in its inadequacy that anyone simply looking at the legislation would react negatively. So, as it is, it is dressed up in a lot of legal language so that when you actually read the bill, it does not really tell you how much money the Federal Government will be receiving.

This independent authority which this legislation seeks to establish is, by its own definition, an agency of the Commonwealth of Virginia and the District of Columbia. In effect, Maryland was cut out of participating in this to such a degree that we were not even involved in creating the agency. The agency was created by the Commonwealth of Virginia, then corroborated in by the District of Columbia, and Maryland was given these 2 places out of 11 on the Commission. That Airports Authority is going to operate the Metropolitan Washington airports under the terms of lease and transfer agreed to in accordance with the act. I made reference earlier to the provisions in the legislation with respect to the lease payments.

The definition of Metropolitan Washington airports encompasses not only the two airports but also the Dulles Airport access highway, the right-of-way—60 million dollars' worth—that is being turned over to the Airport Authority. Of course, as I indicated, the composition of this authority is five members from Virginia, three from the District of Columbia, two Marylanders, one appointed by the President. I do not think there is a Member of this body, except possibly the two Senators from Virginia, who would look at that composition, where they get 5 out of the 11, and say that represents an equitable arrangement in terms of conducting the affairs of this authority. Obviously, it is a loaded authority.

Then, the legislation goes on to discuss how the revenues shall be used. As I indicated earlier, this is a very, very important point.

What this transfer legislation now before us fails to achieve in trying to move from Federal to local control is any reasonable measure of equity amongst the local interests. In fact, the Maryland suburbs of the Greater Washington area represent some 40 percent of the region's population; 2 Maryland votes on an 11-member airports governing panel, as contemplated by the transfer legislation, fails to meet the test of equal representation among local interests. The figures on airport usage further back Maryland's position.

In fact, when you see those surveys on airport usage conducted by the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments, Dulles clearly functions as Virginia's airport with over half of its passenger traffic originating in the Commonwealth of Virginia. National, conversely, is truly a regional air transportation facility. In terms of local passengers using National, the Council of Governments survey found that the top three ranking jurisdictions, the District of Columbia, Fairfax County in Virginia, and Montgomery in Maryland, account for nearly 70 percent of National's traffic.

During deliberations of the Study Commission, these facts suggested to Maryland that all local jurisdictions do not share equivalent interests in the two Federal airports. Thus this single authority proposal now before the Congress is fundamentally flawed in this respect. You cannot really address the problem of fair and equal representation because it tries to force it all into a single authority. And the way to get out of the box is to have National and Dulles transferred separately and not put in the same authority. Transfer Dulles to the Commonwealth of Virginia, which would then equalize Dulles and Baltimore-Washington International Airport, both of them roughly equidistant from the District of Columbia, from downtown Washington. Let Virginia take over Dulles at a reasonable figure and develop it, in competition with Baltimore-Washington International, and then let an interstate authority on a balanced, equitable arrangement run National Airport.

Now, that proposal, as I indicated, did not get anywhere in the Holton Commission, the Commission set up by Secretary Dole and chaired by former Governor of Virginia Linwood Holton. But a lot has happened since that Commission made its report, which is now more than a year ago, and it seems to me we need to take another look.

The report of Governor Holton's Commission was made in December 1984, some 15 months ago.

So the real question is should we take a second look at this thing. There is a problem here that needs to be worked out. We need to develop a structure and a system for the operation of these airports and open up the opportunity to improve them in a vigorous and effective manner.

A lot has happened over this year, particularly at Dulles, which places in doubt the apparent need to have one authority govern both National and Dulles. Back then the Virginia people argued that Dulles could not support itself and its capital development needs, and therefore it needed a subsidy from National's revenue stream in order to keep going.

Now, many of us are very concerned about that because if you allow that to happen and do not limit it, then as Dulles' position improves that subsidy can be used not simply to keep it going but to give it very advantageous arrangements which then heightens its competitive position versus BWI.

In other words, Dulles should have to make it on its own, and developments over the last 15 months in air carrier operations and passenger traffic and freight volumes at Dulles all indicate that it would be in a position to do that, that it can stand on its own without artificial support from National.

Now, if that is correct, why do we not do that? In other words, if there have been developments over the last 15 months of such significance that one ought to take another look at this proposition, then we ought to take another look at it.

There is no prestige so tied to this thing that it has to be pressed through even though it contradicts good fiscal sense, good administrative sense, and good competitive sense. If we did that, then Maryland would be able to compete with Dulles on a level playing field.

This proposal to transfer National and Dulles as a unit through a 35-year lease-purchase arrangement at about $50 million is neither equitable nor very businesslike.

I mentioned earlier the appraisals made by the Grace Commission that valued the combined airports at $341.5 million, more than seven times the amount called for in this transfer legislation now pending before the Congress.

Now, as we wrestle with balancing the budget, as we wrestle with Gramm-Rudman, the idea of a virtual no-cost transfer of National to Dulles strikes me as ridiculous. Where is our good sense here? We should be seeking a fair return on the transfer of these assets, not simply giving them away.

Mr. President, I want to pursue this point for a minute, so that we may have here an opportunity to take another look at it.

Despite the effort mounted by Governor Holton and those who were assisting him, Secretary Dole really should consider revisiting this issue. In fact, she has the benefit of the fact that the State of Maryland does not oppose the effort to defederalize the two facilities. Unlike some who question whether it should happen at all, the State is prepared to accept that proposition. The question is how it would be done. What is the logical, fair, and reasonable way to accomplish the transfer?

The State has taken a very strong position, which I think is a fair one, that any transfer of National and Dulles Airports must be equitable, providing full representation of effected parties and allowing fair competiton.

In divesting itself of these facilities, the Federal Government should not unduly benefit one jurisdiction at the expense of another. The current proposal, the one before us in S. 1017, does not meet this essential test of fairness.

This legislation has not been reasonably constructed and would adversely affect the interests of the citizens of the State of Maryland.

I talked earlier about the usage of these airports, the heavy usage by Marylanders of National Airport, and the fact that Maryland would have only 2 out of 11 members on this board, an authority created by the laws of Virginia and the District of Columbia. Let me cite two examples which illustrate the potential consequences of this underrepresentation on the board.

One, because of its location, access to National Airport is highly prized by the airlines. Everyone knows that. The airlines place a tremendous premium on access to National Airport. With both airports placed in one authority, were an airline to request entry to National for an expansion of facilities there, the new authority could exert strong influence over it to also use Dulles rather than BWI for cross-country or international flights.

Obviously, 2 votes out of 11 could not protect Maryland's interests in this issue. In other words, when you put them both in one authority and when one of the airports put in the authority, National, has highly coveted and difficult to obtain slots, and when the authority's overall financial health and, in fact, its responsibilities to perform are geared to enhancing the interests of both airports, I do not think it is unreasonable to anticipate that the access to the slots at National or an improvement in airline facilities there would be subjected to influence with respect to the use of Dulles.

Second, in its operation of National and Dulles Airports, the new authority will make decisions regarding noise regulations and other operational issues affecting Maryland. With only 2 votes out of 11, it is not hard to predict whose interests will be looked after and whose interests will be ignored.

This noise authority was shifted only at the last minute. That was done after the committee had finished its markup, was added subsequent thereto, puts the control over noise now in this authority, and of course opens up the very real possibility that that issue will not be handled in an equitable way but will be handled in a way highly disadvantageous to Maryland.

That amendment was added in November 1985, after the committee had reported S. 1017, 2 months earlier, in early September.

As I note, this controlling authority is going to be a Virginia corporation. It was passed by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia. The General Assembly of Maryland has not been involved in this in any way, so it is not fair representation. It is regionally unbalanced, and it is not a result of regional consensus. Given the Maryland position which I have outlined before, it seems to me that the basis for achieving a regional consensus existed.

The Secretary did not pick up on that possibility.

In other words, this is not one of those insoluble situations where there is no way to work out what the goals and objectives of the Secretary are, with the concerns and interests of the various regional actors and with the need to provide protection for the Federal taxpayer. It is just not the case that all of those interests cannot be harmonized. They in fact can be harmonized.

As I indicated earlier, Maryland put forward a very constructive proposition. The development in air traffic of both National and Dulles over the last 15 months has altered the financial picture significantly so there is more potential give in order to address the problems of the Federal taxpayers. It seems to me that the Secretary should be seeking a regional consensus and not trying to impose this legislation on some major players in this area.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

Mr. SARBANES. The issue of competition is a very important issue. I have alluded to it a number of times in the course of this discussion today.

The three airports in the Washington region compete for air service. It has been suggested by some that BWI serves a market different from those of National and Dulles, but BWI serves Metropolitan Washington in addition to its service to the Baltimore region.

In fact, in a 1981–1982 survey 30 percent of the users of the BWI originated within the Washington metropolitan area.

Convenience and frequency of air service are a great stimulous to economic development. Each jurisdiction seeks expansion of services to provide stronger incentives for business activity. So competition is a factor and any transfer legislation ought to acknowledge it.

We are not objecting to a situation that puts us into competition. In fact, we would welcome it.

What we do object to is being placed into an unfair competitive position by the inclusion of both of these airports in a single authority with the ability to cross-subsidize and with the turning over of very valuable assets at values far below anything that anyone would regard as being reasonable.

The legislation proposes a transfer price of only $47 million for both airports. This amount would be paid to the Federal Government over a 35-year lease period after which the new authority would own the two facilities. An interest rate of 4.9 percent would be applied to the outstanding balance during the lease period. Listen to that: 4.9 percent interest on the outstanding balance during the lease period, with 35 years to pay it.

The proposed legislation would also include the transfer of the Dulles access road and new businesses for ground transportation at no cost to the new authority whereas similar transportation services at BWI has been financed by Maryland taxpayers.

Thus, the Federal Government intends to relinquish two highly valuable public assets for no more than what was invested some 20 to 30 years ago.

In light of the high Federal deficits, the difficult budget reduction decisions, how can the Federal Government allow these facilities to be transferred at such a ridiculously low price?

As I indicated earlier, as a point of comparison, Marylanders at today's prices have invested $280 million in BWI and the Grace Commission estimated a value for National and Dulles ranging between $292 and $414 million, with a mean value of $342 million.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield. I understand the Senator from South Dakota wishes to address this issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, during consideration of this matter in the Commerce Committee, I let my views be well known. I was one of those Senators to vote against it. I very much want the airports in this region to be prosperous. I very much want to work this matter out. But it is not just a squabble between Maryland and Virginia. There are some national interests here. I come from the State of South Dakota and let me say that many airports take a dim view of the smaller State's concerns.

Since deregulation, everything has gone to the big population centers. People want full aircrafts coming in. We have found that rural interests do not command a great deal of attention in the big city markets. There is a national interest here. My constituents like to come to Washington, DC to petition their Government. In fact, just today I met with bankers from South Dakota and the homebuilders of South Dakota. I met with people from a day care center worried about liability insurance problems, and when I finish this speech there are constituents waiting to see me, all of whom have flown here to petition their Government. Citizens in my State currently have matters before the ICC and other Federal agencies. So we have a national interest.

Let me also say, and I think my colleagues in Virginia would agree, that I am always very supportive of matters that help this region because it is a national center. Be it the Kennedy Center, or way back to the Pennsylvania Avenue Development Corporation, which I voted on when I was in the House of Representatives. I was roundly criticized for supporting it in my home State. I have been a strong supporter of the development of this region and will continue to be. But I have been concerned because this piece of legislation will essentially place in the hands of Virginia and the District of Columbia and Maryland the decisionmaking process that will affect the entire Nation on two airports that have national and international implications.

I think that those States should have the principal say in it, but I also believe that the Presidential appointees should be expanded. I am going to file three amendments if that is proper under the rules without giving up the floor, and I intend to yield the floor back to the gentleman from Maryland when I finish speaking. But let me address the first amendment.

The first amendment is one we discussed in the Commerce Committee. I have made my views well known in the Commerce Committee already. The first amendment would more evenly distribute the membership of the authority's governing board. As presently drafted, this bill reserves five slots for Virginia, three for the District of Columbia, two for Maryland, and one for the President with Senate advice and consent. My amendment would change this makeup to allow three slots for Virginia, DC, and Maryland, respectively; and two for the President with Senate advice and consent.

It is clear that the deck is currently stacked against Maryland. We could just as well not allow Maryland any members if we go forward with the bill as presently designed.

I opposed this bill in the Commerce Committee. Not only is it unfair to Maryland, but more importantly to me it is unfair to the rest of the country. There is good reason to treat these airports differently. They are truly national airports, serving a city that was established for the entire Nation—not any single State.

In the wake of airline deregulation, it is already difficult enough for citizens from States such as South Dakota to have adequate access to our Nation's capital. I am concerned that the more control of these airports we put into the hands of any one State, the interests of the other States will be lost in the shuffle.

Presently, we all have at least an indirect voice in the operation and control of this airport. It is important that we maintain some control so the interests of the other States are not forgotten—or at a minimum, we should at least ensure against giving any one State what is tantamount to almost exclusive control over important decisions that affect all of our constituents. Everyone has a right of access to this city. Important decisions in this regard should not be dominated by a single State.

What I am asking for here are one more Presidential appointee and a more even distribution. However, note that even under the formula in my amendment the District of Columbia and Virginia would still have a majority. The thrust of what I am trying to say here is that the Nation has an interest in this issue—every State in the Union. If people want to petition their Government or appear before a Federal regulatory body or indeed to bring their family here to see our national monuments, they have to rely on our national airports.

The purpose of my second amendment would be to make certain that the U.S. Government gets a fair purchase price for these valuable assets. The estimated worth of these facilities is somewhere between $1.5 and $2 billion. But here we are, ready to give them away for $47 million! It never ceases to amaze me that in our efforts to commercialize or privatize functions of this sort, the Federal Government always wants to give them away rather than seek an adequate purchase price.

We just completed action on a bill to sell Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp., only to find out later that the CBO estimates that it will cost us $250 million to give it away! Now we want to do the same thing with these airports. By the time we sell these assets for the fire sale price of $47 million, then turn around and allow the improvements to be financed through federally subsidized bonds, it will cost us hundreds of millions to give these airports away.

If we are going to privatize, we should at least demand a reasonably fair market price.

Mr. President, my third amendment deals with the federally subsidized bond issue. The purpose of this amendment is to make certain that the Federal Treasury is not raided further after this legislation is enacted. I do not know whether all Senators are aware of it, but under the proposal before us today, we will be forced to continue to pay for this give-away for many years to come.

What will happen is this: After we sell these valuable assets for little or nothing, the local authorities plan to finance many hundreds of millions of dollars in capital expenditure through the use of federally subsidized bonds. If the purpose of this legislation is to help balance the budget, this is a strange way to go about it. Because of the gross inefficiencies of the subsidized bond process, it will ultimately cost us more than if we were to finance these expenditures directly out of the trust fund as the able Senator from South Carolina has proposed.

Now other airport authorities rely on these tax exempt bonds, so why not allow it under this approach. Well, that would be fine if we demand a fair price for it at the outset. Other airports are not built by the Federal Government and then turned over for a song.

Again, Mr. President, this points out the tortured logic behind this proposal, and is in itself a strong argument for defeating this bill. I ask unanimous consent that the text of these amendments be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PRESSLER. If I can yield without——

Mr. TRIBLE. The floor is the Senator's.

Mr. PRESSLER. The floor is the Senator from Maryland's.

Mr. TRIBLE. No; the floor is yours, I would tell the Senator. The Senator from Maryland has yielded the floor.

Would the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PRESSLER. Without losing my right to the floor, I yield for a question.

Mr. TRIBLE. I wonder if the Senator would apply the same tax treatment to airports in his own home State that wish to raise moneys through revenue bonds, or is he going to single out only these airports?

Mr. PRESSLER. The airports in my home State were not built by the Federal Government.

Mr. TRIBLE. So the Senator is going to single out only these airports and permit airports all over the country to use revenue bonds as a way of raising finances? That certainly seems inequitable.

Mr. PRESSLER. Only those airports that were built by the Federal Government, is the point I am making. They are in quite another category. There are other airports in Virginia which are in the same category as my airports, but these are in a different category.

Mr. TRIBLE. Well, I will certainly observe that it is unfair for you to focus on two airports, of all the hundreds and thousands of airports in this country, and say we are not going to let you achieve financing through a lawful purpose, but I am going to permit people to do that in my home State.

Mr. PRESSLER. Well, would not my colleague agree that these two airports are in quite another category? There are several other airports in Virginia—and I have helped my colleague from Virginia in the past, both of my colleagues from Virginia, and will again—but these are two airports that are in a unique classification. They were built by the Federal Government, which is quite different than being built by a State.

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. PRESSLER. Yes.

Mr. TRIBLE. You see, what you are trying to do here is punish these two airports because of their Federal history. But you are not going to punish Virginia, you are going to punish the people that use these airports. I would tell my colleague they include your constituents, the people you say you are concerned about.

By requiring these airports to go out and raise money in more expensive ways, you are going to drive up the costs imposed on all users. That will no doubt include Virginians and Marylanders and people from the Dakotas and people from all over this world that wish to come to Washington. That hardly is equitable. It is hard for me to believe the Senator is serious in advancing that amendment before this Senate.

Mr. PRESSLER. I am not necessarily against selling these airports, but would not my colleagues agree that the value of those airports is much higher? We are literally, with the bonds, we are giving them away with a subsidy. My concern is getting a fair price if we are to do that.

Also, would my colleague not agree the citizens of South Dakota have an interest in this?

Mr. TRIBLE. If the Senator will yield again——

Mr. PRESSLER. Let me conclude.

Would not my colleague agree that the rest of the citizens of this country would have an interest in having more representation from outside of Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia? And probably my colleague from Maryland may disagree with my formula.

But I would like to see more national representation on the board of directors of this operating authority—right now, it is completely controlled by Virginia.

Mr. TRIBLE. Well I have resisted the temptation to engage in debate with the opponents of this bill. I have done that because their obvious purpose is to frustrate and obstruct and not to instruct this body.

I have yielded to temptation in this case because I think this amendment is so outrageous on its face. I suggest to my colleague that if he is concerned about the purchase price, then he should focus his attention on the purchase price. But by suggesting that these airports should be denied the right of every other airport in this country to use the legal means of raising money to enhance the airports his constituents hope to use, I think is foolish and it has nothing to do with the price. Indeed, it only adds an incredible burden on those people that would propose to use these airports, and they, after all, are the people we ought to be thinking about.

Mr. PRESSLER. Would my colleague comment on the authority's membership? I am not trying to obstruct. Indeed, this is the first time I have spoken on this subject and my speech would be over by now.

But in terms of the authority's membership, there will be disputes arising in the future about which flights come in and which do not. There will be disputes about a number of things that he or I cannot foresee. The way this authority is set up, it is controlled by one State entirely. Is that fair?

Mr. TRIBLE. Well, let me respond briefly to the assertion of my colleague and simply say his premise is incorrect. In order for this authority to transact serious business, it requires a heavily weighted majority of seven that far exceeds the representation of Virginia. Indeed, I think anyone that knows anything about these kinds of regional authorities knows that once people are appointed to these authorities, they stop thinking like Virginians and Marylanders and residents of the District of Columbia. They start thinking about the regional interest or national interest and that is what we are about.

If the Senator is genuinely concerned about improving the opportunity of his constituents to come to this city, to petition the Government, to be involved in what goes on here, then I would suggest to my colleague that we ought to get on with the important business of enhancing these airports. We need a new terminal at National Airport. We need new parking. We need a new road system. We need a midfield terminal at Dulles Airport. There is no way those improvements can be achieved but for this legislation.

Mr. PRESSLER. We do all of that cheaper under the Hollings proposal.

Surely, if the people who come on this authority's governing board will think nationally, and if my colleague has been correct, I assume he would have no objection to my first amendment regarding the authority of the membership.

In any event, Mr. President, I wish to yield the floor to the Senator from Maryland. But I ask unanimous consent to send to the desk my three amendments and have them printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say the Senator has a right to send to the desk at this time the amendments for the purposes of printing.

(The amendments are printed later in today's RECORD.)

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, let me conclude by thanking the Chair and thanking my colleagues from Maryland and Virginia, and by saying that I have found since the deregulation of airlines that the air service in my State has suffered immensely. As we turn more and more from surface transportation to air transportation, the only way that constituents from my State and many other States can get to this area is by air.

I think particularly my first amendment reallocating the authority's membership is something that we need to do. It still essentially gives Virginia and the District of Columbia control. It will give Maryland a little more power. But it will give Presidential appointees more, and the entire Nation has an interest in this. I think having one more Presidential appointee would be very appropriate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor to the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to advise that one Senator cannot yield the floor to another.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, my colleague from Virginia made a comment in exchange with the distinguished Senator from South Dakota that I wish to address; that is, he said the purpose here was to obstruct and not to instruct. I would simply like to take issue with that. I have made it very clear that in my view the Members of the Senate have not focused on this legislation up to this point, and need to have their attention drawn to it. In my judgment, attention must be focused before the Senate makes the decision to proceed to the legislation.

The Members need to ask themselves whether it is not the wisest course, in light of the arguments being made, for this bill to be sent back to the Secretary of Transportation and for the Secretary to be asked to try again.

That did not happen with Conrail. But that legislation went out of here with serious misgivings on the part of Members of the Senate. I think the sense on the part of many is that somehow the train, or in this instance the plane, has been put on automatic pilot, and there is no ability to change its course even though the circumstances call for it and require it.

Serious questions have been raised about this legislation from a number of different perspectives. The distinguished Senator from South Dakota, I think, makes a very valid point about the Federal interests in these two airports. They are, in fact, unique, by the Government and operated by the FAA. And they, along with BWI in Maryland, are the access points for air travel to the Nation's capital. So whatever is done with them, one must take that into account.

I say to the able Senator from South Dakota that Maryland had urged before Secretary Dole and her commission that National be put under a joint authority, with equal membership from the two States and the District of Columbia, and with Federal representation, that is with one or two members appointed at the Federal level. I think the point about Federal involvement and Federal representations is a very good point indeed.

If the airports were, in fact, transferred to local or regional control, then the point put by the Senator from Virginia about their access to bonding comparable to the access that other airports have would be a reasonable point—if the transfer has been made. The Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from South Carolina have both made the very interesting point that in terms of cost to the Federal Government, there is really a strong case for making the improvements directly from the available airport trust funds. That would, in effect, save money.

In any event, I thought the Senator from South Dakota put his finger on a very important point. The criticism on the bonding authority is related to the price you are paying for the airports to begin with. It would be one thing if the Senator from Virginia could get up and say that we are really paying real value for these airports, that the Federal taxpayer is getting from us a really generous payment as a transfer of these facilities and, therefore, we ought to have access to the bonding route contained in this bill. When you are getting the airports for virtually nothing, and then the Senator from Virginia also wants the bonding authority, he has really got you coming and going.

As the National Taxpayers Union said in their letter to Members of the Senate—and I now quote them:

> Although we agree that the Federal Government should get out of the business of owning and managing airports, we are appalled at the ridiculously low sale price placed on these valuable properties. The combined market value of the properties is conservatively estimated at $1.5 to $2 billion. Yet the two airports are to be sold for only $47 million, about one thirty-fifth of their actual worth.

Then they go on in a subsequent paragraph:

> In addition, the transfer in future improvements are to be financed with tax-exempt bonds over a 30-year period. This adds up to a double soaking of the taxpayer.

At a minimum this ought to be limited to only one soaking, and not a double soaking. A double soaking is really so far beyond the pale of reasonableness that even those trying to get away with it should be ashamed of themselves. They really should. They should be ashamed of themselves.

So I think the Senator from South Dakota is absolutely right, in his response on the bond question, to insist that it ought to be related to the purchase price to begin with, because this Airport Authority, Virginia-dominated, is going to have it both ways as the National Taxpayers Union says. This adds up to a double soaking of the taxpayer.

It seems to me the course of action that ought to be followed here is for the Secretary to, in effect, say, "I do not have regional consensus." That is obvious. There is considerable concern in the body by Members from other States about a broader national interest. I share that concern, although I have also, in effect, carried the burden of our articulating Maryland's specific problems with this.

We think that the proposal is so egregious that anyone with a sense of fairness will agree with the positions we are putting forward.

Mr. TRIBLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield.

Mr. TRIBLE. If there is so much concern in this body, why is it, after being here for 5 hours, that only three people have chosen to speak against this measure. Where are all these people who are against this?

Mr. SARBANES. I would say to the distinguished Senator who is as familiar with this problem as I am that committees are meeting. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina had to leave the floor in order to go to a meeting of the Budget Committee. I understand they are about to report out a budget resolution this afternoon. They do not allow votes in that committee by proxy. That seems to me understandable under the circumstances.

There were four dissenting votes on the Commerce Committee. I understand that some of those who supported bringing it out of committee now have second thoughts, misgivings, about this legislation.

So I think there is a growing concern.

One of the reasons why we are putting this case in the RECORD, and why I want Members and their staffs to review it in the morning, is that I do not believe this issue has been at the center of Members' attention. I think Mrs. Dole has moved this along as something that the Department is going to do. She certainly lobbied very heavily for it. I understood she visited virtually every Senator. I think Governor Holton has done much the same.

It seems to me we need to lay these arguments out so Members can begin to see that the proposed action is a complicated matter, and that what is being done here has a lot of implications if assets are really being given away. We have no assurance as to how the authority will be conducted. The competitive situation in the Greater Washington region is going to be adversely affected. There will be a significant cost over time to the Federal Government.

If I were a Virginia Senator, I would be chomping at the bit to get this. It is terrific. As I said, I would run all the way to the bank with it. It is incredible. You are getting these two assets valued anywhere from—well, who knows? Secretary Dole ought to go back and try seriously to figure out what they are worth. You are getting them at such a low price that the Governor of Maryland came before the committee and said, "Look, I will give you twice. I will double it. We will put it right down here on the barrelhead, twice the money."

Come on, it is marvelous for you. I understand that.

Mr. TRIBLE. That might be a more attractive offer if we were certain that the checks would not be drawn on a Maryland savings and loan.

May I ask one additional question?

Mr. SARBANES. I do not think the Senator from Maryland has reflected on the faith and credit of the State of Virginia. I think Virginia is trying to do the best they can. I understand that. We do not think it is fair or reasonable. We want to make a case against it.

Our Maryland checks are good.

Mr. TRIBLE. Let me ask one additional question.

If it is the Senator's intention to instruct and not to obstruct, why will not the Senator from Maryland agree for a time certain for a vote tomorrow. The Senator has had 5 hours today, and he would have additional time tomorrow to make his case, if indeed, the intention of the good Senator from Maryland is to instruct?

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator must remember that the benefit of this debate or discussion will be in the RECORD in the morning and Members will have a chance to review it. The Senator from Virginia has options available to him under the procedures. I understand that. He can put a cloture petition on this motion to proceed and we can go to a vote on cloture and see whether the membership of the Senate wants to go ahead and take up this matter.

If the membership of the Senate on that kind of vote decides they want to move ahead and take it up, I would address the substance of the measure at that point, but I would not prolong simply taking it up, although there would be 30 hours after the fact.

It is important that the judgment of whether to proceed—let us assume it is under a cloture petition that the Senator files—is seen by Members as raising the very basic question of whether this legislation is in such form, really, that we ought to be taking it up. I do not think it is. If Members think about it they will say:

> Look, this thing has not been worked out. There is a way here to address the amount of money the Federal Government is getting, to address the Federal interests, and to address the Maryland concerns about unfair competition in a way that maybe a regional consensus can be achieved.

Maybe not. You have to give a lot on some of these questions in order to bring that about.

We have talked about the membership of the Commission. I have talked about the need, in my judgment to separate the two area airports, both in terms of the authority and how they are run. I have talked further about the need to separate them on the financial front in any event. Obviously, these are all prospective amendments. But working out a complicated piece of legislation like this is what we must do.

The committee does not even talk about the sales figure. You can read the whole bill and still find no figure in there as to how much it is going to cost this airport. It is all written out in very legalistic language.

It seems to me this is one of those instances where Members might say, "Look, this thing ought to go back, and they ought to take another crack at it."

There are enough problems connected with this, enough deficiencies in it that we have been trying to lay out and elaborate on here today, that the Senate ought not move on it now. The Secretary, and also those who serve here, ought to readdress the problem, reopen the discussions with the Governors.

A lot of things have changed. When Virginia approached this question earlier, the airport usage figures were very different from what they are today. I do not differ with the Senator from Virginia when he gets up and says, "Look, there are things we need to do at these airports."

I have been through both of those airports. I am not trying to keep those airports down. I want those airports to come up. The real question is, how are they going to come up and what is going to be the competitive relationship as they do that?

It is such a sweetheart deal here that it is not fair to the Federal Government and it is not fair, competitively, to Maryland. I told you, our Governor said he would pay twice for these facilities right on the barrel. Actually, they are worth more than that. I think the price ought to be higher than that. I indicated to the Senator from Virginia that on the bonding authority there is a case to be made here, particularly if this information is correct. If you really succeed in setting them up in an independent authority comparable to what exists elsewhere across the country, then have changed the status of the airports.

But to ask for that and, at the same time, have a giveaway price is, as the Taxpayers Union says, a double soaking.

We indicated in the deliberations some sympathy to the revenue bond problem—but not unrelated to the asking price problem, and not unrelated to the structure of the authority, and particularly not unrelated to the ability to cross-subsidize. If you were on the other side, Mr. President, you would not entertain lightly the prospect of an authority that controls highly desirable slots at National, difficult to obtain, and that can be used as leverage to get service at Dulles, when Dulles is in direct competition with BWI.

Mr. President, I am not asking the Senator from Virginia to give BWI that kind of leverage. I am not asserting here that BWI ought to have National and therefore be in a position to exercise that kind of leverage. No one, in fact, has ever looked at whether it would make any sense to put all three airports in a common authority. That was precluded by the Dole charge. Her charge was to devalue these two.

What I am saying to the Senator is that we want to develop this problem, make Members understand it, and it may well affect their judgment on whether the Senate should go to this matter or whether it ought to be reexamined by the executive branch.

Mr. President, let me address this point, because it came up in the exchange between the junior Senator from Virginia (Mr. TRIBLE) and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER]. That is the disposition of these two airports at an unjustifiably low value and why that is unfair to Maryland and to BWI. If one stops and thinks about that for a moment, it seems to me obvious that, first of all, it allows the new owner of National and Dulles, which is this airports authority, single authority, to embark on a program with respect to the airports unconstrained by the need to pay for the fair value of the property which it has obtained.

I agree that those airports need improvements, and I am in favor of making those impovements. I even would be supportive of the Senator from South Carolina in terms of the way he would seek to do it. But if we are going to put them in this authority, they ought not to be given an unfair advantage in relation to other airports with whom there is competition. There is competition between Dulles and BWI. The proposed authority ought not to be given an unfair advantage by receiving the properties at far less than market value.

Having gotten the facilities at a bargain price—bargain basement price; a giveaway, virtually a giveaway—it is clear why both Senators from Virginia are here, on the floor, and very anxious about this legislation. It is a chance to just grab it and run. I do not fault my colleagues. In fact, I fully understand what they are doing.

Having obtained these facilities as a bargain-basement price, then the airport authority is in a position to set its fees at a level far below the industry norm. In effect, their ability to do so is being subsidized by the fact that they obtain these properties at far less than their real value.

Earlier I went into detail about what Maryland has spent on BWI: at current dollars, $280 million since 1972; $280 million. And, of course, Maryland has to set its fees at a level to recover that investment. Now these airports, both of them, are going to be transferred for $47 million.

Third, the new authority is in a position to subsidize land leases at Dulles, really deriving from Federal generosity in giving, at little or no cost, the power to sublease federally owned land for profitable nonaviation purposes. In other words, they are going to get 10,000 acres out there, 2,000 of it really prime development land. They will be in a position, since they got it virtually for nothing and with hardly any fixed cost associated with it, to lease it at very low rates. They have been subsidized in their ability to lease it.

In summary, by disposing of National and Dulles Airports to this Virginia-chartered corporation at far less than fair market value, the Federal Government is conferring an unfair advantage upon this authority, this Virginia-chartered corporation, to the detriment of a direct competitor, BWI. We want this thing set up on a fair and equal basis and then we will compete. If Virginia can beat us in that competition, then more power to them. Frankly, I think if you have fair competition, it is going to turn out to be to the advantage of both jurisdictions and to the advantage of the users of the airports.

Now, in addition to undervaluation, which I have just been talking about, and the price of the airport, the financial cross-subsidy between National and Dulles would be an egregious unfairness with respect to the Dulles competition with BWI. The proposed authority would be able—despite the provision in the bill, since that does not cover servicing capital improvements—to shift revenues from one airport to underwrite costs at the other. That, of course, is contrary to the standard condition at airports all across the country.

As I indicated, at the time this was considered in the Commission, an argument was made that a low transfer price and cross-subsidy of the two airports was necessary if the new authority was going to be able to afford the improvements at Dulles. That was based on a perception that Dulles was an albatross.

Well, Dulles has turned around. The traffic there has increased by leaps and bounds, incredible figures. It is now operating at a profit. Its growth potential is considerable. It really ignores what Virginia could do with Dulles if in fact it was placed under Virginia. In any event, to keep the two linked together in light of this change in financial circumstances clearly enables Dulles to draw on sources of support for the competition which are outside of the scope of that airport, and therefore, I submit, unfair and unreasonable.

Now, Secretary Dole never opened up the sales process. You have no sense of what might be bid for these airports in that context, although, as I indicated, the Governor of Maryland went before the committee and said he would double the price on the spot.

If the transfers are going to happen—and questions have been raised about whether they should happen—there ought to be fair representation, fair competition, and a fair selling price.

Now, I have serious doubts whether it is possible to achieve fair representation without separating the administrative control of the airports, but some people have put up proposals for even representation with both airports in the same authority.

I have talked about the fair competition, the underwriting that is possible here, of the leverage that is possible through the control of the slots at National to pressure airlines to go into Dulles, and of course the fair selling price.

Here we are tying ourselves in knots about the Federal budget, about the cuts in the budget, about Gramm-Rudman, and yet the price being set on these airports is ridiculously low. I do not think that any real defense can be made of it. I would have liked to hear one, but we have not been given that privilege today. And, of course, that is why a lot of concern has been raised about this entire sale from the outside.

I do not see why the Secretary does not recognize, first of all, that a lot of important circumstances have changed. This is no longer the same issue that it was when it was before the Commission. Second, it has not been worked out in a way that achieves regional consensus, which I think is important. We tried on that Commission to put forward a positive suggestion. It was not accepted. It was made in good faith, and I thought had a lot of merit to it. That was to transfer National to an interstate authority and Dulles to the Commonwealth of Virginia, and then have equal membership from the three jurisdictions on the interstate authority with one or more members from the Federal Government included giving proper recognition of the Federal interest in the Nation's airport. Dulles then would have gone to the State of Virginia to be developed by the State of Virginia.

Now, unlike the current proposal, unlike S. 1017, this other proposal incorporated a symmetry reflecting the locations and functions of the three facilities—National Airport controlled equally by the three parties while Dulles and BWI were to be operated by their predominant users and beneficiaries, Virginia and Maryland, respectively.

This approach would reflect the significant interests that each of the three principal jurisdictions has in National Airport, while permitting Virginia to develop Dulles in the same way Maryland has developed BWI.

This proposal would more accurately have apportioned representation to usage and population. Passengers at National originate throughout the entire region, with significant numbers from each jurisdiction. Considered together with a population distribution of the metropolitan area, a tripartite authority overseeing National would seem eminently logical.

On the other hand, the origin of passengers using Dulles and BWI come primarily from Virginia and Maryland, respectively, thus confirming the logic of independent control by the States in which each airport is located.

We really need to go back and look at this matter to seek a more practical and equitable method of divestiture, if that is the way we are going to proceed. I think the currently proposed transfer is flawed. In their haste to remove themselves from responsibility for these facilities the Secretary and those who counsel her in the Department of Transportation would confer on the authority established under this bill an unfair advantage—unreasonably harmful to Maryland, in terms of competition, and costly to the Nation.

Mr. President, I think it is very important that the national Government, whenever possible, act with impartiality in affairs affecting individual States. No matter how well-intentioned, efforts of the Federal Government should favor no one State or jurisdiction at the expense of another.

There are really two overriding questions. One is, is the Federal Government and the Federal taxpayer, the Federal constituent, being dealt with fairly in this proposal? That question would arise if there were no BWI Airport. The first question is whether the arrangements provided in this bill, S. 1017, the terms on which the Federal Government would divest these two facilities, is fair to the Federal Government and to the Federal taxpayer.

It is my strong position that it is not, that the Secretary is so anxious to dispose of this thing that that interest has been neglected and indeed overlooked.

The other issue here, given the fact that Maryland runs an airport which serves this Metropolitan Washington area, is whether the proposal to divest achieves impartiality in the affairs affecting individual States or whether or not this arrangement does not, in fact, give an unfair competitive advantage.

I support the idea of competing. As I indicated earlier, I support putting forward the proposition that Dulles should go to Virginia, that Virginia should be free to develop it in competition with BWI. But to link the two together in one authority or permit a financial cross-subsidy, allow the use of leverage on access to highly sought-after slots at National, at a price so ridiculously low that they do not face what would otherwise be the normal costs and therefore can structure their entire operations in that light, is not fair competition.

I urge my colleagues to look at this record, look at the arguments, and consider very carefully whether, given the substance of this legislation, it is something to which we really want to proceed. For the life of me, I do not understand why whatever approaches are necessary cannot be taken in such a way that at least some of the issues I have raised would be resolved and a consensus, achieved.

I am very much reminded of the recent Conrail fight. But it seems to me that we have a higher obligation here to the Federal taxpayer and a higher obligation to equity between the States, than routinely to adopt this legislation. It is flawed legislation. It does not reflect what might have been achieved. Whether it can, I do not know. But it seems to me that for the Senate to move ahead on this legislation is a very serious mistake.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from Maryland, who has been holding forth in a very interesting discourse on exactly the concern all Senators should have.

I was temporarily diverted due to Budget Committee markup of the budget resolution. It is interesting that on March 19, much ahead of the schedule originally set in the Budget Act—and before the schedule set in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, that the Senate Budget Committee has reported a budget resolution by a vote of 13 to 8—seven Republicans and six Democrats voted for reporting the resolution. That is the strongest bipartisan consensus we have had for a budget resolution, in some years. What we have had for the past several years was one side reporting a budget in order to get it out, and then when we got it on the floor, it was a veritable donnybrook.

Senator DOMENICI and Senator CHILES have led the way. They have conferred with all the Senators on both sides. There has been a tremendous give and take and a maturity about this approach, a seriousness of purpose, and one that our chairman and ranking member should be proud of when it is on the floor.

I commend the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have, in an early fashion and ahead of schedule, reported a bipartisan budget that is pretty well near the target. I have certain misgivings about the resolution with respect to defense and with respect to education. I think the resolution is low in those functions. Other Senators will have their misgivings. But this is a tough task, where there has to be a lot of give and take in order to become to an agreement.

With respect to the Washington Metropolitan Airport System of National and Dulles Airport facilities, in August of last year I asked the Congressional Budget Office to compare the cost to the Federal Government of two alternatives for financing the improvements of National and Dulles.

What we really have is an avoidance of responsibility. Unfortunately, in this day of instant coffee and instant banking and instant government and hit-and-run driving, with your future, in effect, more or less determined by the 20-second squib of the 7 o'clock news, we all progress as we make headlines rather than making headway. One of the better ways to survive in this game is to continue to make the headlines and not worry too much about the problems.

When there are serious problems, whether it be Contra aid in Latin America in facing up to the competition we have down there, we avoid that. We act as though there is not any competition.

Seven years after we have asked for negotiations, we still hear the word "negotiate." Everybody wants to negotiate, but nobody wants to negotiate. We would negotiate in a second if there were an entity down there that would be willing to do so, but I have never seen a Marxist government that wants to negotiate away its control.

The Reagan administration came in with Secretary Haig and President Reagan talking about invading El Salvador and blockading Cuba, causing some 700,000 Americans to spill onto the sidewalks of New York. They were not worried about Brezhnev. They were worried about our own President. As a result, the President lost credibility with respect to his handling of the problem in Central America. So today, when he wants to negotiate, the only way he can possibly effect it is to make a credible show of force to bring the Sandinistas to the table.

If he makes that credible show of force, then he immediately is tackled from behind by the misgiving of those saying, "Wait a minute. That is what we are worried about. You want to use troops. You really mean what you say. We could get involved."

And then the President immediately says, "Oh, no, I am not asking for troops. Troops are not needed."

There upon, the Sandinistas do not negotiate. There is no need to. There is no credibility. And any kind of threat made is nothing to them but to continue to play a game which we in the National Congress tire of easily.

We are not persistent. We do not have the stick-to-it-iveness that is necessary in any kind of long-range policy.

Obviously, then we go around in a circle and nothing is done and herein the National Airport again. Nothing is done here because nobody wants to take the responsibility for asking for $250 million.

When we went to the commission members and said, "Look, four from Maryland would not even sign on. How about you in the airport business, and everyone else, the pilots and otherwise?"

They said, "Senator HOLLINGS, we would gladly go along with your proposition if we could get the $250 million. That would be the quickest way. But we cannot get a President, we cannot get a Congress, to ask for the money."

We have not even asked for it.

Here is the opposite case where a Congress that is always worried about someone negotiating and never really trying to negotiate, here Congress is guilty of the exact misgiving. We never have tried to improve the facilities at National and Dulles, even though we all think it is necessary. We have not asked for the funds that we have asked the traveling public to deposit in a trust fund by way of the fees paid when they buy their tickets and go through the airports out there. It has built up to $7.7 billion and if all the commitments that are now under consideration were honored immediately there would still be a surplus of $4 billion.

The reason then is not that we do not have the money. The money is there. The reason is that we have not asked for the money and the reason we have not asked for the money is this crowd, this Congress, really does not want to take on the responsibility for Latin America, for airports, for the Government, for taxes, for paying for what you get, for revenues. They do not want to take on the responsibility of anything other than "I introduced." "I made a speech." "I first spoke on that initiative."

They all think that they are supposed to be visionaries in order to hold office. They have this hit-and-run driving tactic where they move from one subject to another and never follow through.

We have excellent facilities that have been properly developed. They just need modernization. We need parking facilities out there. We need the infield terminals at the Dulles Airport very badly. We just would not even ask.

I was bothered about that back in August and I asked the Congressional Budget Office to make an analysis. They wrote on August 21, 1985 to me as a ranking minority member. This was from Rudolph G. Penner, Director of the Congressional Budget Office. He said:

DEAR SENATOR: In response to your request, the Congressional Budget Office has compared the cost to the Federal Government of two alternatives for financing improvements to National and Dulles Airports: (1) direct Federal funding, and (2) local financing from tax-exempt bonds. Based upon your staff's request, we have assumed for both scenarios that the construction costs for improvements at the two airports will total $250 million. As the tables indicate, it would cost the Federal Government more money over time to finance the improvements with tax-exempt bonds than with a direct Federal grant, but the annual tax losses are relatively small and are spread over many years. However, if the costs are discounted to reflect their value in 1986 dollars (assuming a 10 percent discount rate), the Federal Government would lose $116 million in forgone tax revenue if tax-exempt bonds are issued, compared to $215 million if a direct grant is used to finance the construction.

Let me hesitate there a moment about discounting. Discounting is a wonderful, splendid thing, when actually if you are allowed to do so. But, of course, we are not allowed that luxury in Government. We have to pay for what we get. That is why we have so many of what we call off-budget amounts and so many loans and so much exposure that really crunch upon us in the capital market at the present time.

The very moment we are speaking now as a result of this discounting—where we get the services now and pay for them later—we have run up a debt of $2 trillion. So the very first thing that the Government did at 8 o'clock this morning here on a Wednesday morning is go down and borrow $500 million to pay the carrying charges. And you would think that would do something to the debt. No, I am not talking about doing anything to the debt other than paying the interest cost—not the principal.

So Thursday morning we are going down—now the Treasury ought to get worn out doing this—we borrow another $500 million and then we put them to work on Saturday as well and on Sunday as well and on Christmas day every day. Three hundred and sixty-five days around the clock this calendar year of 1986 we are going to borrow $500 million each day.

That is the first act of Government. Why? Not to retire the national debt—just to pay the carrying charges.

Do you know the carrying charges, distinguished colleague, exceeds the cost of general government?

They talk about getting Government—if we did not have that debt around here, I could give you $207 billion in Government. I could build you more airports around here. We could pave it. I could tell you. I would start a runway at Baltimore-Washington International and let it come all the way to Dulles and then have lots and lots of parking and ramps and everything else of that kind and then buy up all the rest of the country's airports and take them over. We would not have to turn them over to the authorities. We could just buy up everybody's airports and say, "Look, it is paid for with $207 billion bucks."

But, you know, on the one hand in our trillion-dollar budget we have $300 billion for national defense, we have Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid—Social Security $200 billion, Medicaid and Medicare $100 billion, $300 billion for the entitlements, Social Security and health care, $300 billion for the matter of defense, and then there is $400 billion left; $207 billion of the $400 billion, a little over half, goes for the carrying charges.

So interest costs exceed the cost of pages and parliamentarians and press facilities for that free press—they like it free I tell you right now, they enjoy it thoroughly—and for the operation of the botanical gardens and the national defense. Well we had to exclude that. But all the other Departments of Commerce, Interior, Agriculture—go right on down the list—the FBI, the Supreme Court, the entire facilities of Government—the carrying charges, just the interest costs, exceed the cost of general government.

That is exactly where we are and it seems like we learned a lesson. Here we come on the floor of the Senate and we want to talk about discounting rates and we want to talk about putting some more indebtedness on the Federal Government and call that, as the Washington Post said, "smart," s-m-a-r-t, that is smart and the other expression "good financial sense."

If you can find a local newspaper cheerleading Congress to continue to spend and spend and borrow and borrow and spend and spend, there is no wonder we are caught up in a loop here. When we go home people look at us like we are freaks. They wonder where in the world you folks are up there in that ivory tower when the Washington Post is saying we are doing a good job putting this debt onto the next generation; let us just break the children and the grandchildren. Let the future Congresses come back up here with all the indebtedness going to put on with the airports and all the other particular approaches that we have in a similar vein and let the ensuing Congresses come up and provide something for health, whatever they can for Social Security, a little bit for defense. They will not have any Weinberger around here. They will have to have someone who is real penurious over there as Secretary of Defense and otherwise just pay the carrying charges.

I am convinced at the present rate at which we are going, the carrying charges and interest costs will exceed the cost of defense.

And there just will not be any room for student loans, women's, infant's, and children's feeding, child care centers, nutrition, and the matter of research and the other particular things for investing in the next generation.

This Government will only be indebted to pay for the profligacy and the extravagance of this present generation. That is what we are going to end up with.

"Here we go again," as President Reagan says.

Going back to the letter from the Congressional Budget Office:

Under the first scenario, we have assumed that the federal government would appropriate $250 million to fund 100 percent of the needed construction costs at the two airports. This option would increase budget authority by $250 million in 1986. Our historical spending rates indicate that this would result in increased outlays of approximately $50 million in 1986, $113 million in 1987, $51 million in 1988, $24 million in 1989, and $12 million in 1990. Federal spending would increase by $250 million over five years, but if the costs were discounted to their present value, they would be equivalent to a 1986 cost of $215 million.

The second scenario assumes that the airports are transferred to an independent local authority that, in turn, issues 30-year tax-exempt bonds to finance the needed improvements. Based on information we have reviewed for other airport improvement bonds, we estimate that bonds would have to be issued for almost $350 million to fund $250 million worth of construction improvements.

Now, is that not something? The Congressional Budget Office says:

Based on information we have reviewed for other airport improvement bonds, we estimate that bonds would have to be issued for almost $350 million to fund $250 million worth of construction improvements.

That is congressional financing. We get all the economists out. We have gotten around and found $250 hammers, $600 toilet seats, I believe it was, and $9,000 coffee pots. We, the diligent, astute Congress, that is, watching the Pentagon for waste, fraud, and abuse—and I will read that statement again for a third time:

Based on information we have reviewed for other airport improvement bonds, we estimate that bonds would have to be issued for almost $350 million to fund $250 million worth of construction improvements.

Here is the crowd that knows how to save money. Where is that Secretary of Defense, that rascal? Bring him in with that $250-hammer, or whatever else he has got. We are prepared not to spend $350 million to get $250 million.

Now, going back to the letter:

The additional funds are used to cover net interest during construction ($60 million), debt service reserve ($27 million), and issuance costs ($9 million). These costs usually add up to 50 percent of the amount of bonds needed to cover the construction. According to Moody's Investor Service credit report, for example, airport bonds for $1.5 billion in 1983 and 1984 financed $983 million in construction programs.

Our analysis also assumes that the bonds would be issued on two dates, rather than through one issue, because of Treasury limits on the time taken to spend bond proceeds. Since the improvements are expected to take five years to complete, we have assumed that the initial bond issue would cover the costs of the first 2½ years of construction, and a second issue could then be made to cover the remaining costs. The tax losses to the government would be about $10 million in the first few years, rising to $12 million after the second issue. These annual tax losses would continue until the bonds mature.

So, right now we do not have any tax losses, Mr. President. We are operating these airports with a profit. But, with this legislation, not only are we taking on interest costs and spending $350 million to get $250 million, but we are incurring what they characterize as "annual tax losses." But we want to assume these tax losses, because we are the Congressmen and Senators that know where the $200 hammers are over in the Pentagon and where that waste, fraud, and abuse is; where that poor little so-and-so who walked up to the counter with food stamps and, instead of buying nutritious milk for the baby, and bought, I guess, filet mignon.

Excuse me. They bought dogfood. I remember that story they had about buying dogfood and they said, "You can't buy dogfood for your dog with food stamps."

So, then the recipient turned around and bought beefsteak instead and fed that to the dog, because you can buy beefsteak but you cannot buy dogfood.

Now, we are very smart on these things. This is the highly intelligent, most deliberative body in the world. We know how to spend money and never increase our pay around here. Everybody in this particular role and responsibility that we treat with it, all these commissioners and everything, they all are paid $250,000 a year. I think we ought to get paid more, but we do not want to pay each other. We are frugal. I mean, we have to really cut the costs around here and not pay the fellow because we are watching every dollar. This is the watch group. The ready-watch crowd is out on the floor of the Senate today because we are not going to waste money. We are against Government waste, but we now want to assume "annual tax losses."

Well, we have tax gains out of there now, but under the Warner-Trible plan—or we will call this Trible-Warner; I want to be proper because I got left out of Gramm-Rudman, thank heavens, at least down home, and I do not want to slight anyone. But under the Trible-Warner thrust here, we are going to take on annual tax losses plus we are going to take on another $100 million, $330 million to fund $250 million.

Well, well. Now we are seeing where the waste really starts in America. They all say it is over in the Pentagon and with the food stamp recipients, but it is right here on the floor of the U.S. Senate this afternoon.

Let me complete the paragraph by Mr. Penner, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office.

Over the life of the bonds, the Federal Government would lose approximately—

What? $366 million in tax revenues. Excuse me, I say to Senator TRIBLE, I did not realize we were going to lose $366 million. Now we are getting in revenues there, and we put that into the fund and we call that the Airport and Airways Trust Fund. That is the official name. And, as we put revenues into the trust fund, it builds up to the tune of $7.7 billion. Now, under Trible-Warner, we are going to start taking away. But the taking away is not anything other than the loss of $366 million in tax revenues. Rather than putting it into the till, we are going to take it out under this option here.

Heavens above, I just do not believe I would be brave enough to introduce that kind of waste. I really do not. But there are some who have courage in the U.S. Senate and they could go back home and explain that. I do not believe I could go back home and explain how, all of a sudden—I have not built anything—I just lost that in revenue.

I do not have to lose it in revenues. The money is in the trust fund that we have gotten from the users of the airport—the Senators, the Congressmen, the constituents coming up here to tend to their affairs and feed into what we call the representative government. They have all been using this. I have. For many, many years I paid my hundreds and thousands of dollars, no doubt, like all others who have been coming in here over years and years. Now, instead of using that money to improve my airport, which is just as much mine as the Senator from Virginia's, I have to all of a sudden adopt this one—$366 million in tax expenditures.

In terms of present value, the loss to the Government would be the equivalent to a 1986 outlay of $116 million. Well, that does not help me a bit back on the stump. Because, you see, my opponent would get up and say, "Look, HOLLINGS, you lost $366 million just to get your name on the airport bill up there. You want it to be known. So you got into an airport bill that cost $366 million that we were having to pay out. Yet, you are down here talking about waste, fraud, and abuse in Government, the Grace Commission report, how we have to economize, and in order to comply with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings we all have to pull in our belts."

Well, with this airport we all ought to pull in our heads. We have to start thinking clearly on this one. I am reading this thing in more shock than I was last August when I first got it.

Dr. Penner said:

It is also worthwhile to note that under the administration's new tax reform proposals, it is possible that airport improvement bonds might no longer qualify for tax-exempt status.

That might happen. I wonder which way our Virginia colleagues would direct us on that particular one. Are they for President Reagan's proposal to eliminate the tax-exempt nature of the bonds under Treasury I and Treasury II? Or are they for tax-exempt bonds for Dulles and National Airports? If you did away with tax-exempt bonds, Dr. Penner says:

In that case, there would be no cost to the Federal Government if bonds were issued to finance the improvements.

Am I led to believe that this airport initiative now is tied to tax reform? This is getting complicated here. I think the Senator from Maryland and I will have to talk for awhile, to understand it ourselves, and perhaps talk some more so I can get our colleagues to understand it. I am looking at that thing. I want to go in one direction.

Am I going in the tax exempt direction? Or am I going in a nontax exempt direction? Apparently under Trible-Warner I am going to maintain the tax exempt status because we want to lose $366 million in tax revenues.

Now the tax tables, Dr. Penner says, provide more details of that cost.

So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this point to have printed in the RECORD the tax table from the Congressional Budget Office. It reads "The Local Financing" Table II, "Local Financing From Tax-Exempt Bonds [In millions of dollars]," dated August 21, 1985.

There being no objection, the table was order to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank the distinguished Chair.

Under the first column, we have the project cost of $250 million commencing in the year 1986. We then go to the construction outlays in 1986 of $49.8 million; in 1987, of $113.5 million; in 1988, $51.2 million; in 1989, $24 million; in 1990, $11.5 million; for a total sum of $250 million.

Then, of course, the 1987 interest during construction is, $8.7 million; in 1988, $14.2 million; 1989, $22.2 million; in 1990, $25.9 million. Just the interest costs for the construction is really more than the asking price for the two facilities. Interest costs in 1 year exceed, let us say, the cost that we would sell National for under this bill, or the cost that we would sell Dulles by itself: Just the interest costs in the year 1990. And over 5 years, they total $60.2 million.

Bonds issues, in the next column, net 273.8, and again in 1988, it is 72.4, for a total of 346.2. So in order to get the $250 million in construction, we actually spend 346.2. We have to issue that many bonds in order to get the $250 million. That is, practically in round terms, $350 million to get the $250 million in airport development.

Then we go to the last column on the CBO table, to Federal tax expenditures. We find right here and now, just in Federal tax expenditures, that we just drew a budget up for, over a 5-year period, of let us say, and you see the average over in the last column—it is not an average. That is what it is, $12.2 million, $12.2 million, $12.2 million—five times $12.2 million, of course, is $61 million. So the Federal loss, through these tax expenditures, exceeds any gain from the sales price, I might say, of Dulles and National, which is a mere $47 million.

It seems like in selling these airports we would look at them and say, "Look, fellows, do you mind just paying us the interest cost to the Federal Government during the next 5 years?" We have just drawn up a budget here. We are all projecting these figures for 5 years hence. I have been struggling for weeks and weeks with the Budget Committee trying to put out an alternative which we just finally agreed upon this afternoon. I had no idea that we were supposed to be enthralled, enthused, and warmed over the idea that we are going to get $47 million when I find out I am losing $61 million in 5 years just in Federal tax expenditures with this particular initiative.

That is hardly fair to the Federal Government. It is quite obvious why this was brought about. This was a sweetheart deal that I think we can operate the airport, and I can give you an authority from Charleston, SC, my hometown. We would volunteer. I think, if they put through this bill to Charleston, SC, we would pay for it, and make more money back. I can get a group down there of entrepreneurs that would gladly come forward, pay up the $47 million, and operate and make even better promises to the Federal Government than what this daring Commission has made.

The truth of the matter is that the full membership of the Commission has not been in favor of this. You have a three-way split. You have the very ones obviously who benefit from the deal. They are 100 percent for it; with common sense, they ought to be for it. It is a terrific operation when you can come in and take over this whole thing, the land and everything else out there, the two facilities, and make yourself a bunch of money. If I was the Governor of Virginia and turned this one down, I would want to know how long I could last in office without being impeached necessarily.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator is absolutely right. Not only do they get the two airports, but they get the access highway and right-of-way including the extension between Interstate Route I-495 and I-66. It cost the Federal Government $60 million to put that road out there—$60 million. That is part of the package as well, along with these two airports. They are paying less than the access road cost let alone the value of the two airports, all of the land, and all of the facilities. It is just incredible. It is no wonder the Governor of Maryland when he went before the committee said right on the spot that he would pay twice the money. He said right now, we will pay twice the money right on the spot. He was prepared to do it. No wonder.

Mr. HOLLINGS. That is right. We have Congressmen running all over this Hill worrying about Mrs. Marcos' shoes and Mrs. Marcos' dresses. Can you imagine such a thing talking about the waste that is going on. Where does the money go? They got all the national news programs looking to see how much else was wasted over there. It is right under their noses. I am telling you. They are going to get national awards for finding out about the shoes and the dresses. But, no, Senator. You are right. What we are supposed to do is come along. What do they call that thing in the Washington Post—"smart?"

I guess they would call it smart. Look at the makeup of that Commission.

Why did they not have the President appoint, let us say, five members, one from Virginia appointed by the Governor, one from Maryland appointed by the Governor, have the Mayor of the city of Washington appoint one, and we could have an eight-man commission, with several from the President. This is a local thing. Maybe they would want two from Maryland and two from the District and Virginia. But the national nature of this facility belongs to the people of the United States.

They ought to have a majority appointed really by the President of the United States to take it over. Let them be confirmed. We would have some input, some oversight on that authority as they came up before us because then we would know that national facilities for a national purpose, for the people of the United States, would be looked out for and I would not have to be worrying about what they are doing in Richmond, whether they are running shy of revenues or whether they have pressure there to bring in a new industry.

You can look at the bill and it says,

The real and personal property constituting the Metropolitan Washington airports shall, during the period of the lease, be used only for airport purposes.

In addition, property that is necessary for additional runway development and property that serves as a perimeter buffer area at Washington Dulles International Airport may not be devoted to commercial building development which would return to the Airports Authority revenue in excess of the Airports Authority's cost directly related to such development.

That is another bunch of words. You can leave that wording out of it. That makes them fiscally responsible and it makes us look like we are not being fiscally responsible. It means nothing more than you pay for what you get.

Next you see the airport purposes. You would think airport purposes was airport purposes.

The bill says,

Airport purposes includes a use of property interests (other than a sale) for aviation business or activities, or for nonaviation business or activities that provide revenue for the Airports Authority.

Is that not tricky? I am telling you. They ought to bring them over to the Budget Committee and we could continue to fool everybody. We could continue to spend and would not have to pay for anything. Forget about Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and all these "let us pay the bills" initiatives around the Congress.

What we have is airport purposes are nonairport purposes. Airport purposes are airport purposes and nonairport purposes.

If you read that, they come in and they put in the nonaviation business or activities that provide revenues.

Necessarily, revenues have to go to the Airports Authority. We know it is going there. It is not going somewhere else. I do not think they will put in a Marcos fund the authority for shoes and dresses. I would think it would go to the authority. There would not be any secret kind of front or anything of that kind, so we know that is and where it would go.

Then they said, "If the Secretary determines that any portion of the land leased to the Airports Authority pursuant to this act is used for other than airport purposes," which is for nonaviation business or nonairport purposes, "the Secretary shall direct that appropriate measures be taken by the Airports Authority to bring the use of such land in conformity with airport purposes," which, of course, is nonairport purposes, "and retake possession of such land should the Airports Authority fail to bring the use of such land into a conforming use within a reasonable period of time, as determined by the Secretary," which language has been provided by the Secretary, which says that aviation purposes is nonaviation purposes.

That is delightful. We have Philadelphia lawyers in the U.S. Senate. They and this Trible-Warner initiative, taking on the $366 million in lost tax revenue, not only issuing $350 million in order to get $250 million, but we say whatever it says it does not say, whatever is airport purposes is nonairport purposes as well as airport purposes.

So there we are.

So I am the Governor. I am sitting over there. I will tell the Senator from Maryland that what we are doing is not manufacturing cars anymore. They are having celebrations in Smyrna, TN, and places in Kentucky, when the truth of the matter is, you ought to see the pallets that come into the ports of Baltimore and Charleston.

We do not manufacture any American cars. We assemble foreign parts with a Japanese robot.

I went to Detroit, to General Motors, and we saw a Japanese robot assembling these foreign cars. I said, "Look, I know a Cincinnati company makes a a better robot than that."

"Yes, Senator, but the Japanese finance it."

So we get a Japanese robot assembling Japanese cars from parts, and they bring them in here already manufactured through the port. You Senator SARBANES, get a little port business and I get a little port business. Then the car manufacturers go up to Tennessee and Kentucky and they hire a few hundred people to assemble it. They have a big celebration and bring up a Japanese flag and surrender.

They say, "Whoopee, we have a big industry and we have jobs."

The truth of the matter is, we have transferred thousands of jobs offshore and have lost the opportunity for research.

My distinguished colleague from Colorado has said, "Look, we are being forced to economize in so much in this budget that we have actually lost our sense of purpose of government. What we need is growth. The way to get that is to invest in research."

Here, what we are really doing is putting in a facility. I can tell you right now, no American company will come to Dulles Airport. There will be Japanese and foreign industries to be located out there, Swedish companies, and what have you, all piling in, for example, to assemble foreign parts into cars so that we can have a celebration somewhere in this country for their putting us out of business.

Whoopee for the Dulles-Japanese development.

But you cannot blame the Governor of Virginia. If I were the Governor of Virginia, I would try to take what I could get. And tell you that even though it is a few crumbs, not a loaf, we have found in many circumstances in this country to take a few crumbs and be happy.

The only thing is that this United States of America is not a Third World country. This is supposed to be a world power. We cannot sustain, Mr. President, if we continue to export our industrial capacity, our manufacturing capacity.

I wish everyone would take the March 3 issue of Business Week and see the piece in there from the chairman of the board of Sony. He said that the United States has given up on maintaining itself as an industrial power. He said we do what I described, taking all the parts and assembling them here. Now, under Trible-Warner, they want to give us another Japanese assembling point at Dulles so we can get rid of a few more jobs in this particular bill.

If we lose $366 million in tax as well as expenditures, get rid of another $350 million just to get $250 million in construction, they will still jump on the Secretary of Defense for a $350 toilet seat. How smart they are.

The Grace Commission, the Patent Commission, alternative bidding—we have so many rules and regulations on Government bidding right now that it is impossible. Nobody wants to participate.

I went down to Greenville not long ago. They have a fine company down there named Woven Electronics. Woven Electronics is something we can all appreciate and understand. It takes something like the webbing you would have in a GI belt, a Navy web belt, and intersperse a fine copper wiring throughout the entire length of the belt. Then that webbing itself gets the real strength from it, with very soft transistor wiring. You weave that in and out a B-1 bomber or submarine, throughout the internal infrastructure of these defense pieces.

The particular owner and operator there, Jack Burnette—he went to the Citadel and I was one of his "rats" when I started off. His son was showing it to me, and he said, "Now, on Monday"—that was yesterday; this was on Tuesday—"we have an order from Burroughs, because we have quite a bit of private business." I am confident the majority of their business is private. "That order on Monday, we are going to deliver on Wednesday, it only takes a couple of days to get the order out and the delivery made.

"That very same order from the Federal Government," and he went over and showed two big stacks of papers—reports, requirements, conferences, reports, requirements, conferences. He said,

It will take 6 months and all that bookwork and instead of the regular personnel delivering it, running it right through the stockroom, we are going to have to assign six people to that particular order and pay for the overhead and take 6 months to deliver the same thing. Why? Because that order came from the Pentagon rather than from Burroughs Machines.

Mr. President, there you go. That is where we talk about waste, fraud, and abuse. If we can slow down this Congress and buy a bunch of mirrors, we would find out, like Pogo, that we have met the enemy and it is us. We start the waste, fraud, and abuse with the kinds of initiatives we have for the Trible-Warner airport grab. These are honorable gentlemen. I started to say "steal" but I would not want to offend them, because it would be entirely improper. I do not know of any more outstanding Members than our colleagues from Virginia. I serve with them on some committees and have the highest regard and respect for them.

I understand what they are doing. They are not stealing anything. But if the Federal Government would be stupid enough to come forward with anywhere from $300 million to $1 billion worth of property to this Senator from South Carolina and say, "Take it off my hands for $47 million, plus the highway, plus the industrial development park of 10,000 acres," the Senator from South Carolina would do the same thing. I would put in here the Hollings-Thurmond grab bill, rather than the Trible-Warner grab bill. I would be an inadequate Senator if I did not do it.

So I do not make that assertion on this particular bill as a matter of blame. But we have to fix where it is coming from. And what really happened here with Governor Holton and that sweetheart commission—the one that never studied anything but arranged the best they could—told General Aviation, "We will take care of you later." They told the airlines, "Get on this. We are going to put a limit on the number of flights in and out of National, but we are removing the cap on the number of passengers. We have an intolerable situation. We cannot handle it out there. But don't worry. You'll get in. The bigger the plane, the bigger the profit.

"We don't care that the runways are not long enough to safely handle the big aircraft at National."

Like Air Florida. With my good friend. I speak respectfully, because of Arland Williams. We have named the bridge, the Rochambeau crossing, the Arland Williams Bridge. He was a Citadel graduate who went into the cold water three times and saved other passengers before he went under himself. So I think upon that, not in a derisive sense, but a rather historic sense and one of admiration for Arland Williams.

But there on these runways, getting off, landings and takeoffs with the rush and the crunch with bigger airplanes now, what we are going to find is we have a threat to safety with the Trible-Warner initiative here on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

We are going to spend $366 million extra in lost tax revenues, we are going to spend another $346 million in bonds trying to get $250 million in construction. We are going to threaten the safety of the passengers and we are going to open up our threat to international trade out at Dulles with what well may become a Japanese industrial park, because American industry does not have any money left. They cannot make any profits here, they have to go offshore in order to make a living.

We are going out of business here in this country today because we do not have a trade policy. The people up in the Northeast think it is pork, hogs from Canada, they joined on the pork resolution. They think it is timber. They want to argue with Prime Minister Mulroney, who was in here from Canada, about timber. The people in South Carolina think it is not only timber, because we have 610 acres down there, and the docks of my home town are full of Canadian timber, but they think it is textiles. We go up to Cleveland, OH, and they think it is machine tools. We go to Detroit and they think it is automobiles. Then in Seattle, they have taken on airplanes, as airbuses are subsidized. We are competing with those Government subsidies and we find out we have a government-to-government enterprise proposition.

We, in the Government, who are trying to look out for the general good of the people of the United States, the common good, instead are looking out for the common good now just because we will not ask and we have a Secretary that is out of sorts with these kinds of responsibilities who says, "Now is the time to get the quick kill. I have gotten the Conrail bill through and all I have to do is get the Trible-Warner airport bill through and we can get rid of that one and tell the dumb Congressmen and Senators over there that they are getting $47 million to offset the deficit. Why should they complain? We don't want to run it anyway, and they don't want to run it, so we can get some responsible people in here to run it."

That is some deal, I say to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, sir, I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I was struck earlier by the Senator's observation when he was looking at the language in the bill that supposedly puts some restraint on this authority and how it is going to use the real and permanent property that comes with these airports.

First, it says this is a lease for 35 years.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Correct, Mr. President.

Mr. SARBANES. Then it says, "The real and personal property constituting the Metropolitan Washington airports shall, during the period of the lease, be used only for airport purposes."

So after the period of the lease, after the 35 years, it can be used for other than airport purposes. That is the first point to make, that they are let out after 35 years.

Then you say to yourself, "Now, what does 'airport purposes' mean? They are restricting the use of this real and personal property to airport purposes. What does that mean?"

So you look over here on the next page, page 37. It says:

For the purposes of this paragraph, the term "airport purposes" includes a use of property interest (other than a sale)—

So it could be a lease.

—for aviation business or activities.

So, you say, well, they are limiting airport purposes to aviation business or activities.

Except they then go on and say, "or for nonaviation business or activities that provide revenue for the Airports Authority."

What kind of provision is that, Mr. President? I read that to be no restriction at all. How does the Senator see that provision?

Mr. HOLLINGS. There is no restriction. It is very cleverly drawn.

Mr. SARBANES. Oh, it is very cleverly drawn.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Masters of rhetoric we are up here. We can mean what we say and not say what we mean. When we are asked by the news media, what we can say is, "I am concerned." That is the way to answer all these questions. I learned at least that much in campaigns over the years. If you ask me about the airports at Dulles and National, I do not have to know anything. All I have to say is, "That is a very good question, I am concerned about that. I am concerned about Dulles. I understand these are very fine facilities out there. But as for Government operations and safety, we are all concerned about it and I am concerned about National and Dulles."

That is what they are saying in a similar fashion here when they got it printed up, so they can say, "We looked out for airport purposes but we have looked out for nonaviation purposes." They have looked out for both. So they have canceled it out.

What the Senator says reminds me of the little contest they had down there for an insurance company in the State of South Carolina, Capital Life. An old-time friend was looking for a slogan for his new insurance company and he thought up a slogan and that said:

Capital Life will surely pay if the small print on the back don't take it away.

Well, that is what we have. We will surely take care of airport purposes and restrict it, but if then you read the small print further, we take it away. They have it in there for nonairport purposes.

We have seen this kind of approach before and we worry about it because they have all kinds of land at Dulles. I hate to see good airport development and then all of us move our offices and highrise buildings and everything else under the flight path then people complain because a plane lands. The reason we have the big hotels and motels, eating places, and all the other magnificent development just across the Potomac over here is on account of the Capitol and the airport facility. Anybody living on the Capitol side trying to get out of town on a Friday knows what a value it is to be located near the airport. And now that they have all these areas populated, urbanized and congested, they complain about it.

Airports now are open after 10 o'clock at night all over America. Airplanes are coming and going in my hometown, coming in from Atlanta, GA, making the connections in Charlotte, 1 and 2 in the morning.

But what do we have here? We have a local interest that has developed contrary to the use of the airport. What we have are noise level restrictions and everything else. So now we have language in the bill saying that they can fix the noise levels, as well as get into nonaviation purposes, and Japanese industries, while soaking the taxpayers for 712 million bucks.

I do not know what else we are going to think of to try to get the attention of our colleagues, but these nonairport purposes begin to develop more and more and more, and before long you look around and you find out that maybe we will have to restrict Dulles—you cannot land there after a certain hour because of the noise and everything—or whatever might happen out there. Perhaps certain industries would want to have a certain height requirement.

Twenty years from now they might want to change around and use some of those 10,000 acres for longer landing strips. Let me get into the Orient Express. Where is it going to take off, I ask the Senator? I had hoped it was going to take off from Dulles. It better be a helicopter and go straight up in the air because what we are going to do now at Dulles is put industry all around and we are not going to be able to have the long runway for the Orient Express that can go to Tokyo in 2 hours' time. That would be pretty nice. You get the Japanese industry out there, and just about the time you get your Japanese industry at Dulles and you think you can take off from Tokyo to land at Dulles, you find out that the industry has cut out the property and you cannot lengthen the runway so you cannot land there.

Maybe the Senator from Maryland ought to change his mind. Maybe we can go to Baltimore-Washington International [BWI]. Maybe they can hold some facilities and some space out there for us because we are not going to be able to hold it here for general airport purposes.

Now, the Federal Government is not into industrial development, and that is why we have the acreage out there that we have used for several other governmental purposes. But we here have no central control in one particular interest and that is the airport users of America, of all 50 States, coming to and leaving from their Nation's Capital. Instead, you have given me as Governor of Virginia five people who want to have industrial development out there. They cannot walk around and say, "Look at what we have with airport use." They want to have some ceremonies. They want to have some groundbreakings. They want to give away a commonwealth flag and they want to have a big banquet and find out about more jobs. Because when I run for reelection in the Commonwealth of Virginia I cannot get on the stump and tell them how I have improved the airport services at Dulles. They will run me out of office. I have to tell them how much more industry I have put there.

I think we are at a crosspurpose here. Our trouble in Congress is we get one measure and we do not look beyond its provisions to the direction which we had and then wonder some years later why the general intent has been frustrated. That is a natural development. If you are going to give me as a Governor of a State some 10,000 acres of fine land all around an airport facility, I am going to put all the industry I can get all around that place.

We just got one—Porsche, in Charleston. Do you know that you cannot buy a Porsche except it has got to be flown into Charleston Airport? They fly them all right in there and we have a big factory, and when I land I look at all those Porsches, all of those expensive cars, $35,000 apiece. All of those Porsches coming into the United States from Europe come through the Charleston International Airport. That is what the airport authority has done. And they are proud of having done it.

Well, that is pretty good for this generation at this particular moment. But think of the expanded needs as between airport users and industrial developers. All authority developers want to be industrial developers. They are all builders, so we put an industry out there at the Charleston Airport. Right now everyone is proud of that.

But what I am thinking is in the future we will experience exactly what we experienced at the National Airport—built up and around, up and around and then you lose the original purpose. In fact, you have to restrict the original purpose of the airport in order to continue its usage. I hope that is not going to happen at Dulles. I am going to have to look this evening when we break at the highway facilities that have been given out there. I hope they are not going to charge the Government a toll for using that highway.

I was just looking, I say to the Senator from Maryland, at page 38. If we read a little bit further, this one has a lot of rabbits in it. This is a good time, Easter time, for us to get all the rabbits we can find in this particular bill. Under section 2, beginning on page 37, "The Airports Authority shall furnish without cost"—this another "We are going to take it away" paragraph, if you know what I mean, with the small print on the back. But I am going to get to the small print. Let me read the big print.

The Airports Authority shall furnish without cost to the Federal Government for use in connection with any air traffic control and navigation facilities or weather-reporting and communication activities related to air traffic control at these airports, such areas of land or water, or rights in buildings, at the airports as the Secretary considers necessary or desirable for these purposes, including construction at Federal expense of additional space or facilities. In addition—

Now we get to the small print—

In addition, all airport facilities shall be available to the United States for use by Government aircraft in common with other aircraft facilities without charge, except, if the use by the Government aircraft is substantial, a charge may be made for a reasonable share, proportional to such use, of the cost of providing, operating, and maintaining the facilities used.

I can tell you here and now, Mr. President, the FAA has a hangar out there now, and they have a fleet of airplanes. The Coast Guard has its fleet of airplanes. The Weather Bureau has its fleet of airplanes. And I am going right on down the list of the various Government entities. So you can look over on page 37 and you see that all of those things are just fine in connection with air traffic control, navigation, Coast Guard, Federal aviation, weather reporting, communication and what have you, except that all facilities shall be available in common with other aircraft without charge "except, if the use by the Government"—let's see if the small print on the back does not take it away—"except, if the use by the Government aircraft is substantial, a charge may be made for a reasonable share, proportional to such use, the cost of providing, operating and maintaining the facilities used."

I can tell you right now, when they are not charging, you are going to pay the bill. I hope they catch Secretary Dole out there and make her pay.

Mr. SARBANES. That is like the other provision we discussed a little while ago.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Now you got it. The small print on the back of page 37. When you get to page 38, they take it away.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator doing this, because it is very important for our colleagues.

Take the next section on page 38, where the Senator just looked. It says:

All of the facilities of the metropolitan Washington airports shall, during the term of the lease, be available to the public, including commercial and general aviation, on fair and reasonable terms and without unjust discrimination.

What happens after the lease is over with? Why is that language in there? Why do they limit the requirement that these facilities be available to the public, including commercial and general aviation, on fair and reasonable terms, and without unjust discrimination? Why do they limit it to the term of the lease?

What that means is that once the lease is over with, they do not have the requirement anymore to provide it on fair and reasonable terms and without unjust discrimination.

There is another instance where they give it with one hand and take it away with the other.

Then, the next section—I ask the Senator about this. He is on the committee. This has to do with the problem of the noise at Washington National Airport. That is a very serious problem in this area, as the Senator knows.

This bill was reported by the committee on September 11, 1985. On November 14, the committee ordered reported a committee amendment which would transfer to the authority full responsibility for regulating aircraft noise at National.

That is a very serious problem, because they have this noise problem at National. They have put on a curfew and planes are required to come in on a certain traffic pattern. Heretofore, the FAA has tried to control that and addressed the noise problem seen by both Marylanders and Virginians.

Now what is going to happen is that the authority to deal with the noise problem is going to be put in the hands of an authority dominated by Virginia. I am very frank to say that Maryland people are very much concerned that the noise problem at National Airport is going to be dealt with by this authority in a way that is going to throw the burden of that noise on Maryland rather than sharing the problem in some fair way with Virginia.

I ask the Senator whether that would concern him—if traffic patterns created a noise problem for constituents in both Maryland and Virginia, and then you look and you are going to put the power in an authority that is dominated by Virginia. How do you think they are going to decide this noise problem?

I think what is going to happen is that Marylanders are going to take it in the ear with respect to the noise problem.

Mr. HOLLINGS. There is no question that the Senator is right on target.

Go back to page 14, and you will see how they drew that. They start off, "The Washington National Airport shall cease to be in effect on the day of transfer, provided further, however, during the term of the lease"—jump down to line 14, paragraph 2—"However, during the term of the lease, the nighttime noise limitation standards currently set out in 14 CFR 159.4 may not be amended."

So, with respect to the Code of Federal Regulations, under that volume and page, where we have nighttime noise limitation standards, they have intentionally red-lined it, given it to the authority. So you can tell their intent by what they had put in there originally and then scratched out.

I am glad we have the distinguished majority leader here, so he can learn and go back home and explain this bill. I want him to get into this tonight. I know he will have a chance.

On page 41 it says:

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no landing fee imposed for operating an aircraft or revenues derived from parking automobiles at Washington-Dulles National Airport may be used for maintenance or operating expenses, excluding debt service, depreciation, and amortization at the Washington National Airport.

So they are going to take it away, because they have in parentheses "excluding debt service, depreciation, and amortization." So they do not have to put anything in there on improvements.

They just run up fees and say, "We have allocated those sums to debt service, depreciation and amortization."

With any auditor, you can put down amortization—any amount of money you want—and say it depreciated that much.

When it comes to debt service, we know they can put $366 million in the debt service on the loss of revenues, plus another $100 million of the costs above the $250 million needed. So that is $466 million in increased costs, derived from the parking of automobiles.

It would be better to walk to Dulles. It is going to be better to go out and never get in a car, because you will have to declare bankruptcy to get out of that airport. That is the way they will have it before they get through. I have seen how they soak them. Talk about Washington, DC, for the parking costs—that is more than the mortgage I have on the car. You go home at night and flip a coin: "Should I pay for the parking fee or let them have the car?"

Mr. DOLE. What page was that?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Page 41, where they have the charge for parking and everything else.

I would like to make sure you came out there with a good fiscal responsibility in order to park your car. You had better have three statements from a bank, at least, and the net worth, in order to get in and out of that airport, because they will say, "Debt service, depreciation and amortization."

If I am the Governor in Richmond, I know how to soak that rich crowd in Washington: "They don't vote for me. All those big Senators are worried about those dresses and those shoes that Imelda has. We are not worried about shoes and dresses here today. We have millions of dollars here, and we are going up on the parking fees and everything else."

I will have to get to the landing fee in excess of 12,500 pounds. I will save that for tomorrow. I have had the indulgence of my colleagues for this afternoon.

The majority leader wants to move the business along. We are not trying to prolong anything, but they talk about getting attention. It is very difficult to take responsible Senators, 100 of us, and get our attention when these kinds of matters come up, because we are thinking not in terms of millions but in billions. We are thinking in terms of what is really a good policy for the safety and security of the democracy in Central America. We are thinking in terms of all the other pressures upon us. No one would think offhand, with all the problems, that we really had a bill of this nature introduced with any seriousness of purpose.

I just do not see how people can talk about waste, fraud, and abuse and put this particular measure in in good conscience when it is going to cost us $712 million just to get the $250 million in improvements, turn it over perhaps to a nonaviation purpose and then raise all the fees to be charged, and raise the parking fees. We could have free parking under a fair price.

Can you imagine that? This would be the one airport in the world where you would have free parking.

All they would have to do is go to the Virginia people and say, "Look, we have fought a good fight, but under the Trible-Warner initiative, they caught us now and to save face we think we ought to pay the Federal Government a reasonable price. In paying them a reasonable price rather than $47 million, we are going to pay them $347 million and we have $300 million in free parking for the next several years around, and then everybody could really enjoy themselves and land at Dulles and Washington with a smile on their face."

I thank the distinguished Chair and yield the floor at this time.

(By request of Mr. DANFORTH, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate today authorizes the transfer of Washington National and Dulles International Airports to a regional authority. In examining this issue, we need ask only one question—Is this action in the public interest? The conclusion I have reached, after grappling with this legislation for over a year, is that it is not. How can it be in the public interest when one of the three airports serving the Washington metropolitan area has been excluded?

The public in question is a complex one. It includes the population of the huge Chesapeake-Potomac megalopolis extending from Richmond to the Mason-Dixon Line and westward to the Appalachians. It also includes those Americans who come to their National Capital from across the country for sightseeing, education, or business. This group merits the special attention of the Congress because it is national in character. And it includes the international travelers who come to the Capital of the free world and are important to us as an element of international commerce and as links with other peoples around the world. This is the public in whose interest we must work.

Three thriving and busy airports—Washington National, Dulles International, and Baltimore-Washington International—serve this complex public. We should seek harmony and cooperation among the three airports to best serve this local, national, and international constituency.

Under the current arrangement, BWI stands apart from the other two airports because it is operated by the State of Maryland while National and Dulles are operated by the Federal Government. The bill before us today only serves to codify the isolation of BWI and gives Dulles an unfair competitive advantage over BWI. Instead of encouraging harmony among the three airports, as it should, it threatens to promote a disquieting discord.

I am not against the idea of turning over National and Dulles Airports to a regional authority. I believe the time has come to do that.

But the only way to accomplish our goal of divesting the Federal Government of these two airports and, at the same time, ensure a balanced air transport system in the Washington metropolitan area is to include all three airports under the regional authority.

Then the public would have a safe and convenient air travel system. Flight schedules at the three airports would be complementary. Competition would be between air carriers, not airports. Bringing the three airports into this kind of cooperative relationship will serve the public interest.

The organizational framework and philosophy creating the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey provides a useful and instructive model for the Baltimore-Washington region and the operation of its three airports. The Holton Commission itself recognized the virtue of this regional approach, hearing testimony from officials representing New York and New Jersey on the history and operations of the authority during its deliberations on this issue over a year ago.

After World War II, New York and New Jersey, as a way to effectively respond to the growing importance of aviation to the national and international economies, placed responsibility for the region's three airports in the hands of the New York Port Authority. As my colleagues from New York and New Jersey can relate better than I, the authority essentially took over the control, operations, and development of La Guardia and Newark Airports and of what is known today as John F. Kennedy International Airport. In so doing, the port authority introduced cooperation where there had been competition among the airports and coordination where there had been disjointed, ad hoc decisions. As a result, the region boasts of having one of the most efficient air transportation systems today, serving the traveling and shipping public well.

In that same manner, we must look for ways to foster cooperation among the three Washington area airports.

The Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, during its deliberations on the bill, made a good-faith attempt to address the equity problem within the context of the legislation. Senators FORD and INOUYE advanced amendments, which I favored, that were accepted by the committee, which had the effect of diminishing the competitive advantage afforded to Dulles over BWI. But the refinements, while providing a more level playing field, still fall short of correcting the inherent inequity in the bill.

The answer is not in the legislation before us. The solution rests with a regional authority that includes all three airports.

While one of the changes made by the Commerce Committee allows BWI to enter the authority at a later date, the legislation is rigidly constructed to provide specifically for the transfer of just Dulles and National Airports. A tripartite authority is, therefore, in practical terms, beyond the scope of this legislation. For this concept to become a reality, Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia would have to go back to the drawing boards and negotiate and frame such a cooperative relationship.

I am hopeful that somewhere down the runway this solution will take off and fly. But the bill before us today should not leave the gate.●

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank all Senators who have participated in the debate today. I think, as I listened to parts of it in my office, there has only been about three quorum calls, so it has been almost an uninterrupted debate since shortly before noon. So I commend my colleagues.

This is a matter of great interest. I have tried to not become directly involved but I will look at page 41. I think it was page 41 the Senator from South Carolina alluded to.

Mr. President, I would hope that we could complete action on this bill very quickly and I do not want to offend anyone, but I think an orderly procedure would be that we would need to have a vote on the motion to proceed. Hopefully we might get consent to do that tomorrow. I will not make that request now. But if not, it would be a vote on cloture on Friday. We will be in session in any event on Friday.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have already indicated to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Senator SARBANES, that I would send a cloture motion to the desk and I do that at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 1017, a bill to provide for the transfer of the Metropolitan Washington Airports to an independent airport authority.

Bob Dole, Paul Trible, Bob Kasten, Thad Cochran, Jake Garn, Mitch McConnell, Pete Wilson, Warren B. Rudman, Ted Stevens, Robert T. Stafford, John Danforth, Paul Laxalt, John Warner, Slade Gorton, Nancy L. Kassebaum, Dan Quayle, Pete V. Domenici, Al Simpson, Jesse Helms, and Chic Hecht.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if there is no further debate on this matter, I think we are prepared to take up the Commodity Credit Corporation conference report. I would hope that we could do without a vote. I have been visiting with my distinguished friend from Montana. Can we get an agreement on that?

Mr. COCHRAN. I do not know.

Mr. DOLE. Ten minutes on a side?
Mr. MELCHER. Yes.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR THE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on House Joint Resolution 534 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 534) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by all of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report will be printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD.)

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I shall review for Senators the events which have brought us to this point.

House Joint Resolution 534, the emergency supplemental appropriations bill for the Department of Agriculture, passed the House on February 26. It included $5 billion for the Commodity Credit Corporation, as well as language which require the conservation reserve and emergency funding for the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation to be subject to appropriation action next year.

Under the leadership of the Senator from South Dakota, [Mr. ABDNOR], the Appropriations Committee, and subsequently the Senate, deleted the House language requiring those programs to be subject to action by the appropriations committees. The Senate then requested a conference with the House to work out a compromise on the resolution.

In that conference, the House conferees agreed with the Senate position concerning the conservation reserve and the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, with a few minor changes. The House conferees then insisted that the conferees state—in bill language—that the amount previously appropriated for the insured operating loan program of the Famers Home Administration shall be available for this fiscal year. After offering to accept this as language for the statement of managers, the Senate conferees finally agreed to the House's proposal with the addition of language making it subject to the sequester order.

Last Thursday night, a point of order to this amendment was sustained, and the Senate voted down an appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

On Tuesday of this week, the Senate, by unanimous consent, again considered the amendment in technical disagreement for the purpose of further amendment. This Senator then offered an amendment which stated that at least $1.7 billion is available for the insured operating loan program and that the Secretary shall proceed immediately to make loans to farmers and farm owners. That amendment also included language suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER], which addressed his concern—as well as the concern of many others—that if funds available for this program are exhausted, the Secretary should request additional funding.

When this was sent back to the House, the House requested further conference with the Senate on the amendment in disagreement.

On Tuesday night and again this morning, the conferees considered various proposals to make this amendment acceptable to both the House and Senate. An agreement was finally reached concerning the Farmers Home provision. That language reads as follows:

It is agreed that at least $1.7 billion is available for the insured operating loan program of the Farmers Home Administration. Therefore, the Secretary shall proceed immediately to make loans to farmers and farm owners. If these funds should prove to be insufficient, other funds should be made available to meet emergency credit needs of American farmers and ranchers.

Mr. President, I support this amendment and reiterate the urgent need for the Commodity Credit Corporation to have access to the $5 billion in this bill. There is also a critical and desperate need for credit assistance from the Farmers Home Administration.

Mr. President, to summarize, let me simply say that I believe we have finally resolved the outstanding issues that surrounded this conference report in particular language that had originally been added by House conferees at their insistence, which provided basically a sense-of-Congress insistence that funds which had previously been appropriated for the Farmers Home Administration operating loan funds be used to help meet the credit needs of farmers throughout the country.

After a point of order was sustained the other night to that language, further amendments were discussed with conferees and as late as this morning we were finally able to get an agreement on that language. Basically, it provides that if the funds are insufficient that are currently available, other funds should be made available to help meet these emergency needs.

We appreciate the assistance of specifically the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] in helping to resolve this issue and in permitting the conference report to be brought to the Senate.

The $5 billion that is provided is desperately needed to operate the programs which farmers are depending upon this year as we enter this planting season.

I urge Senators to support the amendment in disagreement that has now been worked out.

I think this will finally resolve the matter.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, could I just indicate I just had a brief discussion with the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD, that I believe we can dispose of this conference report on a voice vote.

So I am prepared to announce at this time there will be no rollcall votes this evening, because I know many Members have been making calls on each side.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I join with the distinguished majority leader in saying that there will be no more rollcall votes this evening.

I take the floor at this point simply to say that we have checked on our side via telephone and we have no request for a rollcall vote.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished minority leader and I also thank the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], and the distinguished Senator from Montana, [Mr. MELCHER].

This is a very important bill to farmers, and I hope it will be signed as quickly as it reaches the White House.

I thank all Senators for their cooperation, particularly the Senator from Mississippi who has been trying to work it out, and the Senator from Montana who had some good suggestions which have now been incorporated, as I understand, in the conference report.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is right.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the opportunity to pinch hit for the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], who I believe is over on the House side attending some rather significant meetings. When this came up he said if I would stand in for him, he would be grateful. I am very honored to do so.

I commend the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. COCHRAN], for working out with the House conferees the acceptance of some language that would say, in this particular bill, that Farmers Home Administration funds should be examined periodically, to see what is going to be needed for emergency credit needs of American farmers and ranchers during these coming months, and through the persistence of the Senator from Mississippi that language is in this conference report, and I am very pleased that it is.

I hope, as the majority leader has stated, that after we have acted and after the House has acted and the bill gets down to the President, he will sign it quickly.

We have had some indication that the money is needed for the Commodity Credit Corporation in its operation, and I would not want to have any impediment in the way of the CCC having the funds as it needs them.

Having said all that, I hope that the President will sign the other farm bill that we sent down. I think we had a title for it, something called the Food Security Improvements Act of 1986, and I believe the number was H.R. 1614. That went down to the White House on March 12. As of right now—unless something has happened in the last hour and a half—I do not believe the President has signed it yet.

Now I want to refer back to some of the urging that we had here to get that bill down there. The statements reflected the feeling of the administration that we should not be too late in getting the bill down there. It was here for several days while we discussed the question of emergency credit being available for farm and ranch operators. And indeed it is, Mr. President, it is emergency needs. And while there was reason to discuss it here, we were holding up the other things that were in that bill, but some of us felt it was very necessary to dramatize and emphasize how important credit was, particularly lower interest rates, at this time for farmers throughout this country.

To the extent that we delayed the bill which had features in it with dairy questions to be resolved and some questions for ASCS offices across the country as they signed up the farmers in the various farm programs, we were taking some time arguing the case for doing something about getting these interest rates down. Maybe we would have an opportunity for farmers on the brink of credit disaster to be able to have lower interest rates, be able to possibly survive with sufficient credit and have a sufficient cash flow to where their creditors would see that there was a light at the end of the tunnel and keep providing the necessary credit for them.

That is still a problem. We have not resolved that yet. I hope that we will address that problem a little later on this spring. Because, unless we do, I am afraid that too many farmers will be liquidated that could otherwise have been saved if they just had their operating loans at reduced interest rates.

However, it saddens me that there was some urgency about that bill. We meant to delay, dramatizing the need for credit. We did dramatize that and there was a sense-of-the-Congress resolution attached to it drawing that to the attention of the President. But, nevertheless, it saddens me because the bill has not been signed.

Now, there are comments, I believe, going around the halls of both sides of Congress from office to office to the effect that somehow the President is trying to use signing that bill with the dairy provisions in it as some leverage over the way one, two or a half dozen Congressmen are going to vote on the Contra aid issue. Surely, that is an overstated rumor. Surely, nobody is going to be influenced on how to vote on the Contra aid on whether or not the President signs a bill—this is Wednesday—on Wednesday or Thursday or Friday, dealing with an extraneous subject, extraneous to the Contra aid question, and that subject being the provisions in that bill, H.R. 1614, that dealt with the dairy program.

But I think it would have resolved the whole point if the bill had been signed by the President yesterday or the day before yesterday or even on Sunday at Camp David or wherever. I think this is something that the Senate—and I do not say it is just this side, I think it is just the same on the opposite side of this aisle—this Senate does not want to be told that a bill is extremely important, to get it out of here, get it down to the President's desk, and then find it roosting on that desk, unsigned.

I was never too sure, in my own judgment, how important it was to get the bill down there quickly. But I accepted the statement made by my colleagues and the statements made by the administration that it was urgent to get the bill down there quickly.

This is a deliberative body and it is a rather significant body, this Senate of ours—when I say "ours," I mean the entire country—and to sort of having us make statements of urgency in getting legislation passed because the administration points out that it is urgent and then to find out that the bill is still unsigned a whole week later does not make any sense to me.

I draw this to the attention of the Senate tonight because, while the President can still sign the bill—and I have been indicating that apparently it had not been signed since 5 o'clock. An hour and a half or a little over an hour and a half has passed. I cannot believe there is anything to a rumor that states, "Well, he is holding it as a lever over some Congressmen on how they are going to vote on Contra aid."

I do not think any Congressman or Congresswoman is going to respond to that kind of talk and I do not believe the President would make that kind of a statement or inference to anybody. I think that is harmful and degrading to even have the rumor floating around. It is harmful and degrading to the office of the Presidency.

But the other matter troubles me because, when the administration says they want a bill, and says it in a sincere and convincing way, and that it is urgent to have it down there, I believe they should follow through or at least give us an explanation on why it was not as urgent as they thought it was or, if they have some problem in the bill to notify us.

Since none of that has happened, I only say this: Let us not play any sort of charade. If the bill is urgent, it should be signed. If there is something wrong with the bill, I would like to know about it. And if it was not urgent and they found out it was not urgent after they got it, I would like to know that too. I would like to cooperate with the administration on matters of importance, where there is a time limit or timeframe, and where Government performs better if we meet that timeframe. I think that type of recognition is important. I think it works both ways.

I hope that we will have some explanation from the administration in the next day or two telling us what the circumstances are.

Mr. President, we certainly, on this side of the aisle, are very much in favor of this conference report and wholeheartedly endorse it.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, for the information of Senators, the other body has asked that the Senate act first on this conference report. So, upon its adoption, it would go back to the House and, if it is approved there, immediately to the President for his action.

I am also pleased to be able to advise Senators that, as far as can be ascertained, there is no objection to this conference report from the Office of Management and Budget, the Congressional Budget Office, or the Budget Committee here in the Senate.

Mr. President, if there is no further debate, I urge the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. MELCHER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 7 p.m. this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNITED STATES, A TOP WORLD DEBTOR

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, once again yesterday the United States achieved the dubious distinction in setting a new international all-time high trade deficit. The current-account balance, which covers trade in goods and services as well as investment flows between the United States and other countries, reached a record $117.7 billion. We simultaneously achieved the further distinction of becoming one of the four largest debtor nations in the world. Just 1 year after becoming a debtor nation for the first time since 1914, we moved from having a surplus with the rest of the world to having a net debt in the range of $56 billion, just behind Brazil and Mexico, and just ahead of Venezuela.

Both the increasing current account deficit and the growth in our debt, combined with a still high budget deficit and an ever-increasing merchandise trade deficit—which reached a record $148.5 billion last year—spell real economic trouble for us in the months and years ahead. They erode our position in the world economy and they mean economic deterioration and resulting loss in the standard of living for all Americans.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of an article that appeared in today's Washington Post by Stuart Auerbach appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 19, 1986]

TRADE GAP HITS RECORD

(By Stuart Auerbach)

The United States ran a record deficit of $117.7 billion in the broadest measure of international trade last year as it became one of the four largest debtor nations in the world, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

The current-account balance, which covers trade in goods and services as well as investment flows between the United States and other countries, was dragged down by the massive merchandise trade deficit, Commerce analysts said.

The deficit reached $124.3 billion last year, an increase of almost 9 percent over 1984, completely overwhelming small surpluses in income from overseas investments and trade in services such as banking and engineering. The merchandise trade deficit reported yesterday is lower than the record $148.5 billion given in late January by the Commerce Department because it is figured in a different way.

The deficit increased in the fourth quarter of last year to $36.6 billion, from $29.3 billion in the previous three months, indicating a continued adverse balance of trade for this year. At the fourth-quarter rate, the current-account deficit would have reached nearly $150 billion last year. C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics, predicted the current quarter's deficit would be as high as the fourth quarter's.

U.S. BECOMES MAJOR DEBTOR OWING TO HUGE TRADE DEFICIT

Last year's current-account figures show that the United States went from a country that was in the black to the rest of the world by $28.2 billion at the end of 1984, to one that became a major debtor nation for the first time since 1914. This means that foreigners now own more in U.S. investments than Americans own overseas.

The turnaround is considered extremely worrisome by some economists, even though others disagree and President Reagan has downplayed it by declaring it shows the strength of the economy.

The exact amount of the debt will not be released by the Commerce Department until June, but yesterday's figures show that it will be in the neighborhood of $56 billion. That would put this country behind Brazil and Mexico, the largest debtor nations in the Third World, each owing about $100 billion, and just ahead of Venezuela.

While these debts are potential threats to the world financial system, the U.S. debt is not considered as crucial because most of it is in dollars, which the United States can print, and because of the underlying strength of the U.S. economy.

Nonetheless, Bergsten, assistant secretary of Treasury in the Carter administration, said the U.S. debt is likely to top $100 billion by the end of this year, and will reach $400 billion before leveling off.

He called the United States' new status as a debtor nation "a massive deterioration in America's international financial position."

"We will have to pay interest on this debt, and eventually foreigners may want their money back. It essentially puts a sword out there hanging over us," said David Wyss of Data Resources Inc.

But Edward M. Bernstein, an economist at the Brookings Institution, called the overall current-account deficit a bigger problem than the fact that the United States became a debtor nation.

The United States held a current-account surplus until 1982 because investment income and a surplus in trade in services were enough to overcome merchandise trade deficits.

MARCOS' PILLAGE OF THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, in recent events around the world, particularly in the Philippines and Haiti, we have witnessed the yearning for freedom take extraordinary forms. Last month, the world anxiously watched the people of the Philippines rise up to claim their democratic rights and recapture their democratic heritage.

We saw in the Philippines a government increasingly at odds with its own people. We viewed a Catholic Church, moderate opposition parties, the middle class, the media, and other segments of society increasingly disaffected from their government. We saw an election in which the Government was shaken by the dedication and courage of the opposition's campaign and sought by fraud to perpetuate itself in power. While the Filipino people were thankful that the political authority of President Marcos had finally dissipated, they could not imagine the extent to which his lack of moral authority had pillaged their treasury. Ferdinand Marcos fled his homeland in the grand tradition of deposed despots, taking with him a plane load of friends and as much stash as could be jammed into two U.S. Air Force planes. Marcos follows in the path of other autocratic rulers who looted and plundered their country's treasury.

The issue here is one of principle. A principle which we as Americans must honor, defend and, most of all, continue to practice. This principle exemplifies doing what is just, equitable, and conscionable. The United States must act to protect the interests of the Filipino people as well as do what is morally right in its foreign policy. President Reagan and Secretary Shultz must not allow Mr. Marcos to steal what belongs to the people of the Philippines. The facts are plainly obvious. Mr. Marcos amassed personal wealth estimated at $3 to $10 billion on an annual salary of $5,700. I have no doubt that this was the direct result of abandoning the distinction between public and private, between what was his and what belonged to the country.

My concern is twofold. The United States must do everything in its power to assist the new Filipino Government in recovering what is legitimately theirs. This would boost their struggling economy and would eliminate any potential for this issue to become a significant source of friction between the United States and Philippine Governments. Second, if the United States can cooperate with the Aquino government to recover stolen collections of jewelry, art, and money, which are determined by the courts to rightfully belong to the Commonwealth of the Philippines, this can only assist in offsetting future U.S. tax money for aid to the Philippines. The equity of $100 million in four New York City buildings identified in House hearings and documents as belonging to the Marcos family equal 1 year's economic aid from the United States.

Mr. President, the United States should always be a courageous and visible leader in the world, conducting foreign policy based upon principles and ideals. I encourage the Reagan administration to fully cooperate with the Aquino government in resolving this matter through legal and diplomatic methods in order to have a foreign policy based upon justice, principle, and rule of law. Ideally, national security concerns should be in harmony with traditional American values. This ideal cannot always prevail, but in this particular instance, a symbiotic balance is in the interests of both parties.

NEW ZEALAND GRAIN SALES IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, Continental Grain Co. is driving one more nail into the U.S. grain farmer's coffin by importing 30,000 tons—1,200,000 bushels—of New Zealand barley into Stockton, CA, for cattle feedlots and dairies. We hate to lose the business for Montana, Washington, and Oregon barley producers, but it is just another example of the administration being asleep at the switch. The New Zealand barley can be sold here in the United States, but I defy anyone trying to sell United States barley or wheat to New Zealand interests—their government will not let anybody buy it from us. There are no reciprocal agreements with them—it is all just one way, and it is time to change.

The circumstances of the sale are these:

The New Zealand Grain Board 2 months ago negotiated the sale with Continental Grain Co., one of the giant U.S. grain companies, for about $80 a ton for good quality, heavy barley. The ocean freight for Continental was close to $15 a ton, and delivered in Stockton the total cost will be around $95 per ton, which makes it a little cheaper than coming from the Northwest States, where it is around $85 a ton plus a trucking charge of about $20 a ton.

There are a couple of points to note. This is the end of the grain harvest season in New Zealand, and the New Zealand Grain Board, an agency of the New Zealand Government, is probably interested in the sale for dollars to meet New Zealand needs for currency exchange. My personal judgment is that this is a below-cost sale that deserves attention by the United States Government, with a message sent to New Zealand which states bluntly that unless there are reciprocal agreements between our two countries, we shall have to examine future sales to determine whether any part of our market should be open to them. I think it is about time we took care of U.S. grain producers first.

I call upon the administration, through the Department of Agriculture and the Department of State, to determine the question of this sale being below cost, which I believe it is, since I question whether New Zealand is offering further sales at this price.

Second, the question of reciprocal agreements for New Zealand to open their markets for American farm products should be arranged, or our markets should not be open to them. That is what free trade means.

SAMUEL MURPHEY BASON

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the strength of America is not to be found so much in Washington, in the armed services or in corporate board rooms as it is in the many communities, large and small, where honorable, principled men and women set the examples that inspire us to be worthy of them.

On January 17, 1986, I attended funeral services in Yanceyville, NC, for Samuel Murphey Bason, my father-in-law, who had served his community, State and Nation in many capacities throughout his 91 years on Earth.

Sam Bason's contributions to his community are too numerous to detail in this brief statement.

When he passed on to his reward, Sam Bason had been out of the mainstream for many years because of declining health. But despite his extended absence from the scene, I was struck with the way the people in that small town of Yanceyville expressed their love and affection for him when they paid their last respects.

He might have been sidelined by his illness, but he had not been forgotten. On the contrary, his memory was very vivid in the hearts of those who knew and loved this very kind, gentle man who gave so much to so many.

Funeral services for Sam Bason were held at the century-old Yanceyville Presbyterian Church and were conducted by Dr. Donald Boulton of Chapel Hill, NC. He was eulogized by his long-time friend, Robert Clawson, who recently retired as president of The Bank of Hartsville in Hartsville, SC.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Clawson's remarks as well as the text of two articles—one by J.M. Harrelson, editor of the Caswell Messenger, and the other by Erwin D. Stephens, former editor of the Messenger—be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the materials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TRIBUTE TO SAMUEL MURPHEY BASON (BY ROBERT CLAWSON)

I am looking into the faces of the family of Samuel Murphey Bason and those of his many, many friends. Sam Bason was a gentle, kind, caring, and loving man to his family and to his fellow man.

We are here to pay tribute to Sam Bason, and it is an honor and a privilege to be requested by his family to help honor his memory at this service. We all offer our heartfelt sympathy to all the dear Bason family for the loss of this loved one.

He was born the son of William Henry Bason and Flora Green Murphey Bason in Swepsonville, Alamance County, North Carolina, on December 3, 1894. Sam attended Burlington High School, Oak Ridge Military Academy, and the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

He was married to the former Martha E. Hatchett in 1921. She is affectionately known as "Miss Marnie". This union brought forth two daughters and one son: Mrs. Russell B. Long (Carolyn) of Washington, D.C.; Mrs. John J. Burke (Dorothy) of Charlotte, North Carolina; and William Hatchett Bason (Bill) of Jacksonville, Florida. We all know Sam was very much a family man, devoted to "Miss Marnie", Carolyn, Dot, and Bill and to his five grandchildren. He loved them all dearly.

Sam Bason was a highly successful banker and business man, a leader of men. For many years he was President of the Bank of Yanceyville until it was merged with Northwestern bank (now First Union), when he was designated Executive Vice President of the Yanceyville office until he retired some years ago. He was also the owner of the Caswell Insurance and Realty Company. Sam was always held in high esteem by the many customers of the bank and of his insurance company because they knew him to be a man of integrity and one wanting to help them. He could usually be identified by the rose worn daily on his coat lapel, either from the rose garden of "Miss Marine" or from the bushes of his neighbors. As I was coming through the countryside to Yanceyville, I was reminded of his fondness for flowers and of the outdoors and knew Sam had bird hunted some of those fields many times with his dogs and with friends.

Sam was an enthusiastic sports fan. In his youth, he played baseball at Burlington High School, where his team won the state championship. In his latter years, his interest continued in baseball, basketball and football. On fall afternoons, he would often journey to Keenan Stadium, home of the Carolina Tarheels.

Sam Bason was a man of God and he loved his church, having held most all offices in the Yanceyville Presbyterian Church at one time or another. Among them, he was Superintendent of Sunday School for eight years; and Elder for thirty-four years; and Chairman of the Board of Deacons for twenty years.

He loved his country, having volunteered for service in World War I and was in the Army for twenty-two months, half of which was duty overseas. He was proud to be an American. Sam loved community service and was an outstanding leader in his community, and always was for anything that was good. He served as the first President of the Yanceyville Rotary Club and was one of its founders. He served as Master of the Caswell Brotherhood Masonic Lodge #11 on three different occasions.

Sam Bason loved state public service. He was a member of the North Carolina Highway Commission for four years from 1937 to 1941, having been appointed by then-Governor Clyde R. Hoey; served as a member of the North Carolina Gasoline and Oil Inspection Board for 3 years from 1942 to 1945; and served as a member of the North Carolina Railroad Commission in 1957 and 1958.

Sam was held in high regard by governors and other political leaders through the years. He ran for only one elective office: The citizens of the Fifteenth Senatorial District showed their appreciation of Sam Bason by electing him senator to the North Carolina Legislature each time he ran—in 1947, 1953, 1959, and 1965. He was an outstanding senator and was appreciated by his colleagues for his good judgment and for trying to get things done for the best interest of the state. He was chairman of several important committees during this service in the Senate.

Now, I want to tell you of a personal relationship, which I will appreciate as long as I live.

When I worked in the Cannon Mill plant at Salisbury in the afternoons during high school and afterwards at night so I could attend a business college in the daytime, I had a great burning desire to be a banker. When I finished, one of my business schoolteachers got me a job with the North Carolina Highway Department at Graham, not too far from Yanceyville. Sam was the Highway Commissioner for the Fifth Division. That was my first contact with him in 1937 when he would come by the office to visit with the District Engineer and to inspect roads in the District of several counties. That was the beginning of a lasting friendship with Sam and his family.

Later in 1938, Sam told Division Engineer Tom Burton of Greensboro that the next opening of a job in the Bank of Yanceyville, it would be offered to Bob Clawson. He had no idea of my earlier desire to be a banker. I couldn't say anything to Sam, in the meantime, about the bank job possibility because Mr. Burton had told me in confidence. I could hardly wait during those next several months. In March of 1939, he came to Graham and asked me to go to Yanceyville to be his secretary, bank clerk, insurance clerk and bookkeeper. Providence had found a way for me to get into banking through Sam Bason. He was a great mentor and I have been thankful throughout my 46 years in banking for having such a good teacher and good friend. My wife, Annie King, and I named our third son "Samuel" in his honor in 1948.

He, "Miss Marnie", and his children have been my close friends. Through the years, they have made me feel like a member of their family. I wanted to be a successful banker like Sam, a man of honesty, a man interested in his community, and a man anxious to voluntarily serve his community, county and state.

I can say I have tried to emulate his life in many ways. I an glad to be one of those whose life was touched and influenced by Sam Bason.

Yes, we will have fond memories of Sam Bason and he will be missed. We can be comforted, however, in the knowledge that his soul is with our God. May God's blessings be upon the Bason family, and his surviving sister, Mrs. Alice Bason Roney.

In closing, I want to read some Scriptures that I personally view as Sam Bason's feeling of trust in our God, and as I saw his light shining on this earth.

PSALM 23

The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want.
He maketh me to lie down in green pastures.
He leadeth me beside the still waters.
He restoreth my soul.
He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.
Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me.
Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: Thou annointest my head with oil, my cup runneth over.
Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

MATTHEW 5—VERSES 15 AND 16

Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house.
Let Your light so shine before men, that they may see Your good works, and glorify Your Father which is in Heaven.

We are grateful to God for the life of Samuel Murphey Bason.

SAM BASON DIES AT AGE 91

(By J.M. Harrelson)

Former banker and well-known local civic leader Sam Bason of Yanceyville died Wednesday of last week in the Roman Eagle Memorial Home in Danville, Va. He was 91.

Bason, a native of Swepsonville in Alamance County, was best known here as president of the Bank of Yanceyville, a post he held up through the merger of the bank with Northwestern Bank (now First Union). He also served four terms as a state senator representing Caswell and Rockingham counties, and was a member of the State Highway Commission for four years.

In addition to his post at the bank, Bason founded and operated Caswell Insurance and Realty Company.

Bason was a charter member and first president of the Yanceyville Rotary Club, and was a Master of Caswell Masonic Brotherhood Lodge Number 11 for three years. A veteran of the U.S. armed forces, he saw 22 months of action in France in World War I.

Bason was known by many in Caswell County for his cheerful attitude towards life, his professional bearing and for his great interest in Caswell County and its people. Long before the concept of 'personal bankers' came about Bason made many friends through his banking practices. Many Caswell residents recall that Sam Bason had a way of making them feel as if they "were doing him a favor" by using his bank as their financial institution.

Over the many years Bason spent in Caswell County, he saw many changes, and is remembered as being one of the driving forces for progress here.

Funeral services for Bason were held at 11 a.m. Friday at the Yanceyville Presbyterian Church by the Rev. Dr. Donald Boulton and by Robert G. Clawson, a family friend who once worked with Bason in the Bank of Yanceyville. Masonic graveside rites were held in the church cemetery.

Survivors include his wife, Mrs. Martha (Marnie) Hatchett Bason of the home; daughters, Mrs. Russell Long of Washington, D.C. and Mrs. John Burke of Charlotte; a son, William Hatchett Bason of Jacksonville, Florida; a sister, Mrs. Alice Roney of Hawfields, N.C.; five grandchildren and one great granddaughter.

TRIBUTES RECALL SAM BASON'S LOVE OF FELLOW MAN—FORMER MESSENGER EDITOR REMEMBERS OLD FRIEND

(By Erwin D. Stephens)

The poet who wrote "Let me live in the house by the side of the road and be a friend to man" was describing the life of Sam M. Bason and his beloved wife and faithful companion, "Miss Marnie" Hatchett Bason. He was an outstanding citizen, civic and church leader, statesman and counselor for many people throughout his adopted county of Caswell. A man of sterling character, integrity, wisdom and courage, he stood for the right and what he thought was best for this county and his state.

His friends, both rich and poor, black and white were numbered in the thousands and his influence will live on in his devoted and remarkable wife, his three fine children, his lovely grandchildren and all of those whose lives he touched. I counted him as an intimate friend of mine and my family for more than forty years until the passage of time took away his awareness of those who loved and respected him.

He took a small bank and built it into a strong financial institution for the people of his county until it was merged with a larger financial institution.

While his body was laid to rest in the hallowed ground of the Yanceyville Presbyterian Church, his outstanding merits and his memory will linger long in the minds of the people who knew, loved and respected him.

CONTRA MILITARY LEADERSHIP STILL FORMER SOMOZA OFFICERS

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, last Thursday, the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus released a report entitled, "The Contra High Command: An Independent Analysis of the Military Leadership of the FDN." It concludes that 12 of the 13 principal leaders of the FDN Contra force "are today, as they have been since 1980, ex-National Guard officers," who served the Somoza dictatorship.

It is especially important to note that the Department of State, while differing on what constitutes the "High Command," confirmed my contention, supported by the caucus report, that the FDN leadership is largely in the hands of former officers of the Somoza National Guard. On March 13, in response to my letter of March 4, in which I asked specific questions regarding the FDN military leadership, the State Department confirmed that 9 of the 13 names listed by the caucus were members of the FDN leadership. The caucus continues to contend that 12 of the 13 members of the High Command are former Guard officers. As the caucus report states, while service in the National Guard need not be viewed as itself disreputable, the problem is that the administration wants to arm, equip, and train these people, some of whom were "personally responsible for brutality * * * repression or corruption, as well as close personal associates of Somoza."

Senator HARKIN is inserting the full text of the caucus report into the RECORD, and I commend it to my colleagues for careful reading. In addition, I would like to share with my Senate colleagues a letter that has been sent to all House Members by Representatives HCHUGH and MILLER of the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus, highlighting the principal findings of the report. I ask unanimous consent that the full text of that letter appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, March 18, 1986.

CONTRA HIGH COMMAND STILL DOMINATED BY EX-GUARDSMEN

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Our colleague Bob Lagomarsino wrote you on March 13, disputing the finding of two Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus staff reports that the primary contra army is "organized and commanded by former National Guardsmen." On March 17, the State Department released the data on which Rep. Lagomarsino based his contention—the names and backgrounds of what the Administration defines as the FDN's military leaders.

We welcome the attention being focused on this critical issue of the background of the military leaders of the FDN, since this year's largely military aid request would go to FDN military leaders rather than UNO civilian leaders. Having sought for about a year now the Administration's listing of names, we are glad they have finally declassified them, and that their data actually confirms most of our report's data, and strengthens its conclusion that the contra High Command is still dominated by former Guardsmen.

While the Administration has certain quarrels with the definitions we use in our listing (and we with theirs), there is now virtually unanimous consensus among both supporters and opponents of contra aid that the majority of the FDN's top military leaders are ex-Guardsmen.

This is not only our conclusion: it is that of UNO leader Arturo Cruz, who conceded in a recent interview (Washington Post, March 9) that "the largest number in the inner staff" are ex-Guardsmen; of Central America analyst Robert Leiken, who has written (New York Review of Books, March 13) that "the FDN high command, with one exception, is drawn entirely from the National Guard"; and now of the Administration.

While we continue to believe, as the report states, that "serving as an officer in the National Guard need not be viewed in itself as disreputable," we do continue to be concerned that U.S. aid could be going to and being distributed by former Guardsmen with documented records of repression and in certain cases personal brutality toward civilians, as well as close personal associates of Somoza.

Our differences of opinion with the Administration come over several aspects of their counting methods and certain of their findings about individuals who they contend have left the FDN, but who our sources contend remain in positions of power. For instance:

Although we both find a dozen former Guardsmen now in the High Command, the Administration contends there are 9 other important "military personnel" who were not Guardsmen, and thus concludes that the 12 Guardsmen are only about half of the High Command. We dispute their inclusion of the 9 others as military leaders, because in our view their duties are clearly not military: the Administration includes the heads of the finance office, the legal office, the hospital, public relations, and social services. Our definition of "High Command" did not include those with political or social duties; nor do we believe it should.

The Administration confirms 9 of our 13 names and positions, but of the remaining 4, contends that 3 have left the High Command and makes no mention of one. Our independent sources, including former FDN officials who first made these detailed charges a year ago and have confirmed them with FDN sources in Honduras within the past month, maintain that the 3—Maj. Ricardo Lau, Capt. Armando "The Policeman" Lopez and Capt. Justiciano Perez—are still serving in the High Command. The final officer we list as heading the officer training school; the Administration lists no such position.

Our major difference with the Administration, which results in different statistical conclusions, relates to the large number (over 100) of individuals the Administration claims are in the lower-level military leadership, in the field commands. While last year's Caucus report did list commanders at the field level, this year's report clearly indicates that we are unable to confirm or refute any current listing of field commands. Our independent sources believe that many of these units have disbanded as functioning military units (in fact they call them "Ghost Commands" because they exist only on paper). We note that the Administration's list appears to be based on material published recently by the FDN itself. This raises the possibility that the Administration is relying primarily on FDN claims, which have been vastly inflated in the past.

For those who have not seen the Caucus report, we repeat the listing provided by our independent sources of the name, current position and (in 12 of the 13 cases) former Guard rank of each member of the Contra High Command:

Personnel Commander: Lt. Harley "Venado" Pichardo.*

Intelligence Commander: Lt. Rodolfo "Invisible" Ampie.*

Logistics Commander: Capt. Armando "Policia" Lopez.†

Special Operations, Nicaragua: Carlos "Pajarito" Guillen.*

Special Operations, Honduras: Maj. Ricardo "Chino" Lau.†

Air Commander: Capt. Juan Gomez.*

Counter-Intelligence Commander: Maj. Donald "Toro" Torres.*

Indian force liaison: Capt. Justiciano "Pino" Perez.†

Officer Training Center Commander: Lt. "Trampas".†

*Confirmed by Administration.
†Disputed by Administration.

Sincerely,

MATT MCHUGH.
GEORGE MILLER.

THE CONTRA HIGH COMMAND

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, as the Senate prepares to consider the President's request for $100 million aid for the Contras, it is critical that we are fully aware of the background of the military, as well as the political, leadership of the Nicaraguan democratic resistance.

For this reason, I commend to my colleagues' attention the following report, "The Contra High Command: An Independent Analysis of the Military Leadership of the FDN," prepared by the staff of the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus.

The report concludes that 12 of the 13 commanders of the High Command—the Estado Mayor—are today, as they have been since they were first organized in 1980, former officers in General Somoza's National Guard. I believe it is especially important this year to focus on the military rather than the Civilian leadership of the Contras. Seventy percent of the President's aid request is for military aid, which will fall under the military leaders' jurisdiction, rather than that of political leaders such as Arturo Cruz.

Information provided by the Nicaraguan Government is not used in this report. Instead, the research is based largely on publications of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force [FDN] and interviews with former FDN officials, Edgar Chamorro and Salvador Icaza. Former FDN Director Chamorro has reviewed and confirmed his information within the last month with FDN sources in Honduras. Caucus staff supplemented these primary sources with interviews on the background of ex-Guardsmen with respected American analysts, including Prof. Richard Millett of Southern Illinois University, Col. Edward King, and former high-ranking U.S. diplomats.

Formed in 1959 by Senator Joseph Clark, as a small breakfast discussion group, the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus has grown to its present day size of 130 members. The caucus is a bipartisan group composed of Members of the House and Senate who are concerned with foreign and military policy.

Mr. President, I request that a copy of the report, "the Contra High Command," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CONTRA HIGH COMMAND: AN INDEPENDENT ANALYSIS OF THE MILITARY LEADERSHIP OF THE FDN

Over the past five years, the United States has provided over $100 million to support the armed opposition to the Nicaraguan government. Within the next few weeks, Congress will vote on an Administration request to provide $100 million more to the contra force.

This report seeks to provide a current analysis, based on independent sources, of the military leadership of the contras. This review is especially important since this year's request (unlike last year's) is 70% military aid, which will clearly fall under the jurisdiction of the FDN's high command rather than its civilian umbrella group.

This report, which updates a study of last April, charts the membership of the high command; names individuals in each position; provides biographical information on as many of the individuals as possible; and reviews the creation and evolution of the high command.

Information provided by the Nicaraguan Government is not used in this report. Instead, the research is based largely on FDN publications and interviews with former FDN officials Edgar Chamorro and Salvador Icaza. Former FDN Director Chamorro has reviewed and confirmed his information within the last month with FDN sources in Honduras. Caucus staff supplemented these primary sources with interviews on the background of ex-Guardsmen with respected American analysts, including Dr. Richard Millett (Professor at Southern Illinois University and the leading American academic on the Nicaraguan National Guard); Colonel Edward King (a retired U.S. Army officer and frequent visitor to both FDN and Sandinista camps, whose Army service included acting as liaison between the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Nicaraguan National Guard officers); and former high-ranking U.S. diplomats.

SUMMARY OF THE FINDINGS

In summary, the analysis concludes:

The contra army remains a peasant army commanded by former National Guardsmen;

12 of the 13 members of the FDN's Estado Mayor—the military High Command or, literally, the "chiefs of staff"—are today, as they have been since 1980, ex-National Guard officers;

While serving as an officer in the National Guard need not be viewed in itself as disreputable, the High Command includes ex-Somocistas who were personally responsible for brutality against political opponents, repression or corruption, as well as close personal associates of Somoza;

Unlike the civilian leadership, which has undergone three major upheavals since the FDN's creation, the military leadership has remained constant since 1980—increasing concerns that the military rather than civilians like Arturo Cruz and Alfonso Robelo would ultimately hold power if the contras took over;

Regional and Task Force commanders are in a state of transition, as units have disintegrated and returned to their families in Honduran camps, and as many of their commanders have been wounded or killed in action. Administration claims (which are virtually identical to FDN claims) that there are some 15 Regional Commands and over 50 Task Forces are challenged by independent sources as "Ghost Commands," formed on paper to enhance the image of the contras' effectiveness; and

Both the Administration and the FDN confirm that there is a high level of Somocista involvement in the FDN military leadership; but by apparently broadening the definitions of leadership in order to reduce the percentage of Somocista involvement, the Administration's overall statistical findings are open to question. The Administration's further insistence on classifying as "secret" the names and duties of high FDN military leaders, even though the FDN publishes some of this information, does not lend confidence to their findings.

BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION ON THE CONTRA HIGH COMMAND

This section provides background information on the FDN High Command, referred to in FDN camps and documents as the Estado Mayor or Comando Estrategico. Of the 13 men listed here, 12 were officers in the National Guard. FDN publications themselves confirm the name, position and background of 8 of the 13 individuals named here.

Of particular concern in this group of 13 are a number of high-ranking ex-Guardsmen with controversial backgrounds who the FDN denies are part of the High Command: Capt. Armando "The Policeman" Lopez, Maj. Ricardo "Chino" Lau, Capt. Juan Gomez and Capt. Justiciano "Pino" Perez. According to the FDN, the only Guard officer above the rank of Lieutenant now serving in the FDN is Col. Enrique Bermudez. According to our sources, though, the concentration of operational authority in these former high-ranking officers continues to be a reality for the FDN.

Supreme Commander: Col. Enrique Bermudez

Bermudez, 53, was one of the most senior officers in Somoza's National Guard. He commanded the Guard's contingent when Nicaragua responded to a U.S. request to send a symbolic force to the Dominican Republic after the U.S. invasion in 1965. As a full Colonel (the highest active rank possible, since Somoza was himself the Guard's commanding General and precluded others from active service at that rank), he was sent to Washington during the last three years of Somoza's rule as military attache, where he tried, largely unsuccessfully, to obtain U.S. military aid for the Guard while it fought the revolutionary forces led by the Sandinistas.

According to Col. Edward King, who worked with Bermudez in the 1960s, both of these assignment were "plums," highly-valued rewards for Bermudez' personal closeness to Somoza. Most of our sources vigorously dispute the Administration's contention that Bermudez was "posted out" of Nicaragua because of differences with Somoza. However, a former leading U.S. diplomat in the area believes that tension did exist between Somoza and Bermudez, and that this contributed to his being sent out of the country. Although the Administration claims that the U.S.—in Somoza's final months—recommended that Bermudez replace Somoza as Guard commander, the Caucus' former diplomatic source, who was actively trying to find a replacement acceptable to Somoza, dismisses this contention as a "fantasy" and a "non-issue."

In 1980, Bermudez formed the Argentinian-funded 15th of September Legion with Somoza business and Party associate Aristides Sanchez. The Legion carried out sabotage raids and assassinations inside Nicaragua. In 1981, Bermudez and Sanchez founded the CIA-funded FDN. Bermudez has since served on every FDN Directorate, and has headed the FDN High Command. The presence of Bermudez and his close associates Maj. Richard Lau and Capt. Justiciano Perez (see below) in the FDN has been cited publicly by Eden Pastora as the reason he refuses to join the FDN. Bermudez' official title in FDN documents is El Comandante Estrategico, the equivalent of Supreme Commander, but he is usually referred to in the contra camps by his nom de guerre, "3-80."

Theater Commander: 1st Lt. Walter "Tono" Calderon

Calderon, 30, (known in the contra camps by his nom de guerre,. "Tono," a contraction of his nickname, Antonio) graduated from the Guard military academy in the mid-1970s as a 2nd Lieutenant. After further training at U.S. military schools, he commanded combat units from 1976 to the end of the war. In 1979, as a 1st Lieutenant, he is said to have commanded troops in Somoza's palace guard, which defended the President's bunkers through the final days of the revolution.

He appears to be respected for his skills as a field commander by the Sandinistas who faced him both during the revolution and after, when he led an FDN Task Force. FDN publications in Honduras identify him as El Comandante de Comando Operaciones Tacticas, the equivalent of theater commander. In this position, he coordinates and directs the regional commanders.

GENERAL STAFF

G-1, Commander of Personnel: 1st Lt. Harley "Venado" Pichardo

Pichardo, a former 1st Lieutenant in the Guard, led a FDN task force until he was badly wounded in 1984. He has served as G-1 for over a year. As commander of personnel, he controls payrolls and advises Bermudez on personnel placement. He is known in the contra camps as "El Venado," the deer.

G-2 Commander of Intelligence: 1st Lt. Rodolfo "Invisible" Ampie

Ampie, 34, is known in the contra camps by his nom de guerre, "El Invisible," a name he acquired while leading an FDN task force. He served as a 1st Lieutenant in the National Guard, and was an early FDN task force leader. He was promoted to the High Command in 1985, and served initially as G-5, Commander of Psychological Warfare, a position that has rotated frequently and appears to be vacant at present. According to our former FDN sources, "El Invisible" was a popular task force leader who retains the intense loyalty of troops who served under him.

G-3, Commander of Operations: 2nd. Lt. Luis "Mike Lima" Moreno

"Mike Lima," or "M.L.", is the nom de guerre of one of the contras' most charismatic commanders, 2nd Lieutenant Luis Moreno, 26. A cadet at the Nicaraguan military academy who was commissioned in 1979 at age 20 with the rank of 2nd Lieutenant, he saw action in the last year of the revolution before joining the exodus of Guardsmen to Honduras.

Assigned to lead the "Diriangen" regional command in 1983, he built it up into the FDN's largest and most active, with some 2,000 fighters inside Nicaragua by late 1984, when he was badly wounded in a mortar explosion and lost an arm. After a period of recuperation he joined the High Command as G-3, commander of operations, a position in which he plans strategy with the Theater Commander. Like "El Invisible" (see above), "Mike Lima" retains a strong following among the troops who served under him in the field.

G–4, Commander of Logistics: Capt. Armando "El Policia" Lopez

Capt. Armando Lopez is one of Bermudez' closest associates, and is considered by a number of our sources to be his principal military adviser. Lopez acquired his nickname, "El Policia," under Somoza, when he commanded units of Managua's metropolitan police, a branch of the National Guard. In the contra camps, he is referred to as "L–26."

"El Policia" is controversial both because of his brutal behavior toward FDN prisoners (according to our sources), and because of his prior service with the Managua police—which Somoza used to arrest hundreds of civilian political opponents. By the late 1970s, international human rights organizations reported substantial numbers of tortures and assassinations by the Managua police.

"El Policia" was a founding member of both the 15 September Legion and the FDN. Known as a hard-line anti-communist opposed to negotiating with the Sandinistas, he has told reporters: "He who speaks of dialogue with the Communists speaks of wasting his time. . . . We'll fight this war to the finish if we have to use picks and shovels. We won't hold peace talks over the graves of our dead."

In addition to advising Bermudez on strategy and personnel decisions, Lopez orders all military and logistical supplies for combat units, and controls distribution of the materiel.

CENTRAL COMMANDERS

Special Operations (Nicaragua): Carlos "El Pajarito" Guillen

Guillen, 39, is known in the contra camps as "El Pajarito," the little bird. A medical student in Mexico during the revolution, he is the only member of the FDN High Command who did not serve in the National Guard, although his father was a Guard officer. As Commander of Special Operations in Nicaragua, he leads small groups on sabotage and other special missions. According to Caucus sources, he is a solid soldier and popular with his troops, but has little sway in Bermudez' inner circle.

Special Operations (Honduras): Maj. Ricardo "Chino" Lau

Lau, the most controversial member of the FDN High Command, is a close associate of Bermudez. Caucus sources confirm numerous press accounts of his brutal and criminal behavior both during his Guard service and his tenure with the 15th of September Legion and the FDN.

Although the FDN claims that Lau left the FDN in 1983, Caucus sources unanimously report that he remains powerful in the High Command. According to former FDN official Salvador Icaza, "where there is Bermudez, there is Lau . . . forever." Specifically, it appears that Lau now commands a small unit that carries out special counter-intelligence missions in Honduras for Bermudez, such as executions of suspected Sandinista informers. This unit is said to include Lt. "El Policita" Lopez, the son of Capt. Armando "El Policia" Lopez (see above), also known as "El Bestia," or the beast.

Lau attained the rank of Major in the National Guard. He was extremely close to Somoza, and served in his security police and then on his Estado Mayor as G–2, chief of intelligence operations. In this capacity, he arranged for hundreds of political arrests and at times supervised or approved clandestine torture and execution. Lau was cited during the revolution by an independent Nicaraguan human rights commission for commanding a massacre of civilians in a church in Jinotepe. Eden Pastora, who commanded rebel forces during the revolution, has cited the presence of Lau, Bermudez and Capt. Justiciano "Pino" Perez (see below) in the FDN as a principal reason why he has not joined the organization.

Lau was an original member of both the 15th of September Legion and the FDN. In both organizations, Lau and a small circle of associates under his command have been accused of conducting assassinations and robberies. A former Salvadoran Army Colonel accused Lau of arranging the murder of Salvadoran Archbishop Romero while he was celebrating mass in 1980. As late as 1986, Lau was formal commander of all counter-intelligence operations for the FDN, but he was replaced by Maj. Donald Torres (see below), and now focuses on special operations approved personnally by Bermudez.

Commander of Air Operations: Capt. Juan Gomez

Gomez, a close personal associate of Somoza's and for years his personal pilot, was a founding member of the 15th of September Legion and, as a member of the initial FDN directorate, a signatory of the Acta creating the FDN Estado Mayor in 1982. He has commanded FDN air operations for the past five years, as well as served as Bermudez' personal pilot. He is responsible for acquiring, maintaining and using the FDN's small fleet of Cessna fixed-wing reconnaissance and attack craft, C–47 cargo planes and Hughes 500–D observation and attack helicopters, which are based at Honduras' U.S.-constructed Aguacate airbase.

Commander of Counter-Intelligence: Maj. Donald "El Toro" Torres

Known in contra camps by his nom de guerre "El Toro," or the bull, the FDN's chief of counter-intelligence served as a Major in the National Guard. In 1983, he joined the FDN High Command as G–2, Commander of Intelligence, replacing another Colonel, Edgard Hernandez, who was implicated in corruption following a CIA investigation of pay-roll funds. In 1985, he replaced Maj. Ricardo "Chino" Lau (see above), who has been serving as chief of counter-intelligence. "El Toro's" primary duties involve assessing recruits to determine if they may be Sandinista agents.

Liaison with Indian Force: Capt. Justiciano "Pino" Perez

Perez, like Maj. Lau, has frequently been reported by the FDN to have left the contra camps, only to resurface again. As a Guard Captain, he assisted Somoza's son in commanding the Guard's infantry training school, known by its initials EEBI. As is the case for Lau and Bermudez, Perez' presence in the FDN has been cited by other opponents of the Sandinistas as a barrier to a coalition with the FDN.

Perez was a member of the 15th of September Legion, and led a Legion splinter group that bombed civilian airliners bound for Managua. He joined the High Command in 1982, and although the FDN claims that he left in 1984, Caucus sources assert that he has remained in the High Command, serving Bermudez as liaison with the MISURA Indian forces.

Commander of the Officer Training School: 1st Lt. "Trampas"

A National Guard 1st Lieutenant operating under the nom de guerre of "Trampas" has responsibility for the FDN officer training school, the Comando Centro de Entrenamientos Para Comandos, C.E.C. The school was originally established by Argentinian and CIA trainers, but now operates without foreign instructors.

Commander of Artillery: 1st Lt. "Roberto"

According to an FDN document dated March, 1985, a National Guard 1st Lieutenant operating under the nom de guerre of "Roberto" has responsibility for the Comando Unidad de Artilleria, or united artillery command. Caucus sources are unable to confirm his presence in this position at present, or name a different artillery commander.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE FDN HIGH COMMAND

Shortly after the fall of Somoza in 1979, thousands of Nicaraguan National Guardsmen, including hundreds of officers, fled the country to El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and the United States. During 1980, Aristides Sanchez, a wealthy business and party associate of General Somoza then operating out of Miami and Tegucigalpa, Honduras, began to contact former officers to put them on the payroll of what began to be called the "15th of September Legion," commemorating the day of Nicaragua's independence from Spain. According to Edgar Chamorro, funds for the Legion's payroll came from Argentine intelligence officials operating in Honduras and from personal funds amassed during Somoza's rule by Sanchez and his brother, planation-owner and Somoza party legislator Enrique "the Cuckoo" Sanchez.

Founding legionnaires—all of whom remain in the High Command, according to Caucus sources—include Col. Enrique Bermudez (Somoza's military attache in Washington), Maj. Ricardo Lau (Somoza's top counter-intelligence officer, later accused of numerous assassinations including the murder of Salvadoran Archbishop Romero), Capt. Justiciano Perez (commander of the Guard training center under Somoza's son), Capt. Armando "El Policia" Lopez (who commanded units of the Managua police, which carried out arrests and attacks on Somoza's political opponents), and Capt. Juan Gomez (Somoza's personal pilot).

A U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency analysis in 1982 (later made public by the Associated Press) referred to the Legion as a "Somocista group."

According to the DIA, the Legion carried out minor sabotage in Nicaragua for a year before joining the FDN in late 1981, merging with Steadman Fagoth's Indian group and southern-based ex-Sandinistas of the UDN/FARN movement. By this point, according to Chamorro, the former Guards' salaries were being paid by the CIA. A small group of Legionnaries led by Perez and Col. Francisco Rivera continued to operate independently into 1982, according to the DIA, bombing a Nicaraguan civilian airliner in Mexico City, hijacking a Costa Rican civilian airliner in San Jose and sending a suitcase bomb on a Honduran civilian airliner that exploded in the civilian area of Sandino Airport in Managua. This group apparently disbanded in 1982, and Perez and Rivera also joined the FDN.

The Caucus has obtained a copy of the signed Acta formally creating the FDN High Command, or Estado Mayor, in September, 1982. The 10 signatories of the document were Aristides Sanchez, former Sandinista Vice-President Jose Cardenal and 8 National Guards, including Bermudez, Lau, Gomez and Rivera.

According to Col. Edward King, the structure of the Estado Mayor, and particularly the designation of general staff positions G-1 through G-5 for functional duties, derives from the National Guard's own structure, established by U.S. military advisers who trained the Guard throughout its 40-year history. Both King and Chamorro note that assignments and duties are more fluid than they would be in a national High Command, given the less structured nature of an insurgency and the importance of individual loyalties to the retention of power. However, they point out that those in the High Command do consider themselves to be a formal military Estado Mayor (also referred to as Comando Estrategico), and do refer to colleagues by appropriate military designations.

Unable to exercise power over Sanchez and Strategic Commander Bermudez, Cardenal left the FDN, and a new nearly all-civilian directorate was installed with CIA support in December, 1982. Two years later, Chamorro, a member of the new directorate, followed Cardenal's example, and left while protesting the control of military operations by what he calls the "Bermudez triangle" of former Guard officers intensely loyal to Bermudez and Sanchez, who by this time had become FDN General Secretary. A third civilian restructuring took place in 1985 when Cruz and Robelo formed the UNO umbrella organization with FDN civilian head Adolfo Calero.

Through the three major changes in the civilian leadership, one thing remained constant: the military High Command continued to be nearly exclusively former National Guardsmen. When a CIA investigation of corruption in the use of CIA payroll funds led to the resignation in December, 1983 of four of the original members of the high command, including three signers of the September, 1982, Acta, they were replaced by other Guard officers rather than younger non-Guardsmen with combat experience. In spite of attempts by Administration and FDN civilian leaders to "cleanse" the FDN image, there has been virtually no change in personnel in the High Command in the two succeeding years. The military leaders have apparently managed to exempt themselves from these political pressures.

In April, 1985, the Caucus published a study, based on interviews with Chamorro and Icaza, naming 12 of the 13 members of the High Command as former Guard officers. Without identifying specific individuals, the State Department, in a letter shortly thereafter from Assistant Secretary Motley to Caucus Chairman McHugh, confirmed that "nine of the ten member general staff" were former Guardsmen.

Similarly, Central American analyst Robert Leiken reported in the March 13, 1986, New York Review of Books that "the FDN high command, with one exception, is drawn entirely from the National Guard, and many were senior officers in it." Even UNO Director Cruz stated in a Washington Post interview of March 9, 1986, that "the largest number of the inner staff" are former Guardsmen, although he asserted that they "are aware of the need for democracy and are aware of the need to forget about the past."

In a February, 1986, report, though, the State Department, while not disclaiming its previous position that 9 of the 10-member general Staff were Guards, appeared to modify it by stating that 12 of the 21 "top positions" in the FDN military were held by former Guards. Included in the new State Department count were "all members" of the "civil-military commands" and "all chiefs of support services."

It is not clear why these civilian-held positions are now considered to be part of the military command now when they were not considered as such last year. In its January, 1984, issue the FDN publication Comandos identifies the following positions as part of the civil-military command and the support services, none of which involve participation in military command decisions, and few of which are related to combat operations:

Three civilian members of a civil-military committee.

Director of the central hospital.

Director of the regional clinics.

Director of public relations.

Director of publications.

Director of political education.

Director of the rebel radio ("15th of September")

Director of social services for combatants' families.

Director of transportation services in Honduras.

Director of acquisition for food for Honduran camps.

Director of acquisition for military supplies.

Director of human rights.

It is likely such officials are included in the State Department's most recent count, but this can not be verified, since the Department refuses to provide the names or positions of its roster of the High Command in unclassified form. It is misleading at best to include such personnel among "top leaders" of the FDN military. Our definition of the High Command, unchanged from last year, focuses on those who the FDN itself calls the Estado Mayor (or Comando Estrategico), those planning and directing military operations. We find that like last year, 12 of these 13 top leaders are former National Guardsmen.

STATUS OF THE FDN ARMY AND OF REGIONAL AND TASK FORCE COMMANDS

The FDN Army

This report's conclusion that the High Command is dominated by ex-Somoza National Guardsmen does not overshadow another finding of last year's report: that the army as a whole is, and remains, a peasant army.

While concluding that the FDN is a peasant army with a High Command dominated by former Guard officers, the report does not attempt to evaluate it as a fighting force, to assess its human rights record or to fix its size—about which estimates range from the Administration's claim of 25,000 "potential" fighters of whom 6,000 are active inside Nicaragua today to independent estimates of 12,000 FDN soldiers, of whom no more than 1,000 are currently inside Nicaragua.

Regional and Task Force Commands

Serving under the High Command are two key levels of FDN military leadership, the regional commanders and their task force commanders. Unlike last year, when the Caucus identified five of six regional commanders and all 30 task force commanders as former National Guards, Caucus sources contend that these commands are currently in such a fluid state of transition that identification of them is neither possible nor very meaningful.

The primary reason for this is that the intense and largely unsuccessful combat of the FDN fall offensive badly disrupted FDN organization at the field level. Many commanders appear to have left due to injury, death or simply fatigue. As units have left the combat region to which they were detailed, they appear to have lost their cohesion, as soldiers returned to FDN camps in Honduras to join their families and friends. It is unlikely that functional regional and task force commands—and their commanders—will emerge until the FDN refits itself with additional external support.

This raises doubts about recent claims by the Administration and the FDN that there are 14 regional commands and 52 task force or independent commands. If organized combat-ready units are the criteria for claiming the existence of a functional regional command or task force, this total of 62 field commanders (of whom 17 are said to be former Guards) is greatly overstated.

In addition, the FDN's most recent listing of field commanders (on which the Administration seems to have based its counts) appears to be a year out of date and self-contradictory. First, it is virtually identical to a version circulated by the FDN last March, although most observers agree that there has been great turmoil in the field command structure during this time. And second, it includes contradictions, perhaps related to its being dated: for example, the FDN list names "Mike Lima" as commander of the Diriangen regional command, but the FDN cover letter for the list states that his wounds, suffered over a year ago, forced him out of a regional command and up to the general staff, as reported in last year's Caucus report. Such apparent inconsistencies lend doubt to the credibility of the FDN list.

The FDN's most recent listing confirms all six names and five of the six reported backgrounds for the regional commanders included by the Caucus in last year's report, but it adds eight regional commands which one of our former FDN sources refers to as "Ghost Commands." The fabrication of a "Ghost Command" could be motivated either by corruption, since commanders are provided with per-soldier salaries which they then distribute to their troops, or by a desire to inflate overall troop strength to impress foreign audiences, such as Congress.

BUDGET ANALYSIS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE NEW YORK STATE CATHOLIC CONFERENCE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I recommend my colleagues read the careful, important analysis of our Federal budget situation just provided to us by the New York State Catholic Conference on behalf of the Roman Catholic bishops and dioceses of New York State. The Catholic Conference met this morning in the Capitol with members of the New York congressional delegation. These are dedicated people who have hands-on knowledge of the problems of poor and disadvantaged people in their State.

Speaking for her organization, Sister Serena Branson, executive director for Albany's Diocesan Health and Social Services, gave us a dismal overview of the effect of past budget cuts and proposed future cuts on the poor and vulnerable members of society.

Sister Serena cited a Congressional Research Service study which found that the 1981 cuts in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children [AFDC] program alone impoverished over one-half million—560,000—persons, the majority of whom were children.

And more of the same misery may be forthcoming. The administration's proposed fiscal year 1987 budget recommends over $8 billion in cuts in low-income programs. By 1991, these cuts will mount to $21 billion on an annual basis.

And what outcome can we expect? The answer is obvious to those who can speak from experience. Ms. Mildred Shanley, of the counsel's office of the Catholic Charities Diocese of Brooklyn put it succinctly today:

> Between 1970 and 1983, the State's poverty rate among those under 18 rose 13 percent. Over half of the increase occurred between 1980 and 1983, when an additional 350,000 children fell below the poverty line * * *. A child born in New York State in 1970 had a 1 in 10 chance of being poor. Today, a child's chances of being born into poverty are nearing 1 in 3.

What should we think about ourselves having helped to foster such an outcome?

The New York State Catholic Conference sets an ambitious legislative agenda for us. In sum, it calls for the reversal of most of the administration's spending and tax program. Much of the conference's recommendations are contained in legislation, S. 1194, the Family Economic Security Act, which I introduced last May 23 along with my colleagues in the House, Representatives HAROLD FORD and CHARLES RANGEL.

The New York Catholic Conference is not alone in its analysis of what is happening. Mayor Henry G. Cisneros of San Antonio, TX, speaking before the 1986 Congressional-City Conference, characterized Federal budget trends over the last 5 years this way:

> It is a disastrous dismantling of the Federal-local partnership. It is a meat-axe chopping of the domestic obligations of Government.

The mayor went on to point out that, since 1980, while the Federal deficit has grown from $27 billion to $200 billion, spending for urban programs have plummeted from $69 billion to $17 billion. He adds, "and it is we who are blamed for the deficit."

I ask that the full text of the analysis and policy recommendations of the New York State Catholic Conference be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

NEW YORK STATE CATHOLIC CONFERENCE

FEDERAL BUDGET OVERVIEW

On behalf of the Council of Catholic Charities Directors, I want to first express our understanding about the difficult budget dilemma which faces Congress this year. We recognize that the budget deficit must be reduced, that there is always concern about defense spending, and that especially in light of the President's initial negotiating position, it is difficult to raise taxes.

Yet, as Cardinal O'Connor has indicated in his introductory remarks, we must view this budget process from the perspective of its impact on the poor vulnerable members of society.

We want to share with you briefly our perspective on four major issues related to the Federal Budget process:

1. Our concern for the impact that the last four federal budgets have had on poor and vulnerable families and individuals.

2. Our preliminary analysis of the impact of the President's budget on the population for whom we are concerned.

3. The impact of implementation of the Gramm-Rudman Bill if the deficit must be reduced by $60 billion as some economists now estimate.

4. Our perspective on the relationship of domestic spending, the military budget and taxes.

Obviously, any analysis of this current year's budget process must begin with an understanding of the impact of the last several years' budgets.

In the written materials in your briefing book, we have summarized some of the major effects of cutbacks in the Federal Budget from 1981-1983 as analyzed by the Congressional Budget Office.

The results of these cutbacks have been devastating. For example:

The Congressional Research Services found that the 1981 cuts in AFDC alone pushed 560,000 more persons into poverty.

The Congressional Budget Office stated in a 1984 study that budget and tax changes enacted from 1981-1983 would force low and moderate income households to lose $20 billion in income and benefits over the three year period 1983-1985.

Many other studies have demonstrated similar results.

We are concerned that enactment of the President's proposed budget would have further negative impact on these trends.

According to an analysis of this budget by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities:

Proposed cuts in low income programs would total over $8 billion next year and $21 billion in 1991.

Fourteen low income programs would be eliminated outright and benefit reductions would be made in nearly all basic low income benefit programs.

By 1991, low income programs would be reduced by nearly one-sixth.

We have also included in your materials a fuller analysis of the President's proposed cutbacks in low income programs, as developed by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

We feel compelled to make comment also in this federal budget overview on the Gramm-Rudman Bill, because we recognize that the two houses in Congress and the President may not be able to come to agreement on deficit reduction methods and that the Gramm-Rudman automatic deficit reduction process may well be triggered for Federal fiscal year 1987.

Obviously, we are pleased that the Gramm-Rudman law exempts such low income programs as Medicaid, AFDC, SSI and Food Stamps from the automatic deficit reduction process but, nevertheless, many programs which assist low and moderate income programs will be affected. Examples are Head Start Programs, a variety of employment programs, low income energy assistance, and so forth. We have also included in your written materials a listing of the approximately $300 million in such programs that would be lost in New York State if the Gramm-Rudman automatic deficit reduction is triggered at $60 billion for Federal Fiscal Year 1987.

Our understanding of the impact of cuts in low income programs over the last four years, and of the potential harm that would result from adoption of the President's budget proposal on the implementation of the Gramm-Rudman automatic deficit reduction provisions leads us to three bottom line conclusions about the Federal Budget:

First, there is no more room for reductions in the budget of programs which benefit low and moderate income persons.

In fact, according to the Congressional Budget Office, tax concessions granted under the 1981 Economic Recovery Act (ERTA), along with increased defense spending, have been virtually the sole source of our increasing national deficit.

We have included in your briefing book a document detailing some facts about defense spending, corporate tax expenditures and the deficit.

This analysis leads us to our two other major budget recommendations:

We believe that in light of the deficit situation and the great need to fund human resource programs, there is a need to increase federal resources and the tax base while still promoting tax equity. We are concerned with the shortsightedness of ignoring the revenue potential on the tax side of the budget available not only through broadening the tax base, but through further curbing wasteful tax shelters and expenditures, reforming corporate tax policy to reflect a fairer share, and enacting stronger compliance procedures to collect the $90 billion lost annually through tax-fraud. While we applaud the concept of exempting poverty households from the payment of federal income tax, the current tax proposals remain predominantly revenue neutral, and contain alarming reforms that could impact heavily on the broad middle class of the nation. They neither raise necessary new revenues by retrieving larger amounts of revenue foregone, or go far enough in addressing equity issues. Instead, they propose reforms such as restricting deductibility of charitable contributions, which will have further negative effect on the provision of human services and harm the middle class worker, particularly in New York State.

Finally, we recommend reductions in Defense Budget of $37.5-40.0 billion dollars in the following fashion:

1. Approximately $16 billion through a freeze of budget outlays at FY 86 figures within National Defense Function (050).

2. Approximately $20 billion through improved managerial control over the purchase of equipment from private contractors and improvements in contract management waste and fraud accounting.

3. Approximately $2-4 billion through the scaling back of eleven major weapon systems identified by the Congressional Budget Office as sources of potential cutback due to questionable merit (these savings would grow in future years due to the extended and deferred costs of these weapon systems contracts—CBO estimated that outlay savings for these eleven weapons systems including the controversial MX land-based missile would be $10 billion by 1990).

BUDGET WOULD MAKE LARGE CUTS IN LOW-INCOME PROGRAMS

REDUCTIONS OF $8 BILLION PROPOSED FOR NEXT YEAR—14 LOW-INCOME PROGRAMS SLATED FOR TERMINATION

The Administration's FY 1987 budget contains sharp cuts in low income programs totaling over $8 billion next year and $21 billion in fiscal 1991, according to an analysis issued today by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

The Center found that 14 low income programs would be eliminated outright and that benefit reductions would be made in nearly all basic low income benefit programs.

The Center's analysis also reported that by fiscal year 1991, low income programs would be reduced nearly one-sixth.

The analysis shows that reductions in low income programs would be three times larger than the savings from the much-discussed sale of certain government assets, which is also proposed in the next budget.

In addition, the Center reported that 2 million elderly persons living below the poverty line would be required to pay more out of their own limited incomes for Medicare coverage.

"The budget proposal would exact a substantial tool on poor families and low income elderly persons, while providing for a very large increase of $34 billion in defense appropriations next year," Center director Robert Greenstein noted. "These proposals would be likely to reduce standards of living and increase hardship for many who are poor."

Reductions in low-income programs

The new budget contains reductions in all of the core benefit entitlement programs for the poor—Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), Medicaid, food stamps, and Supplemental Security Income (SSI)—the Center reported. Cuts in these programs alone would total $2 billion next year, climbing to $6.5 billion in FY 1991. Over the next five years, a total of $22 billion would be taken from these programs.

The largest of these cuts would come in Medicaid, where federal financial support would be reduced significantly.

"It would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for states to cover the losses of Medicaid funds simply through administrative changes," the Center observed. "Major reductions in the coverage of low income beneficiaries or in the scope of medical services provided would be virtually inevitable."

In non-entitlement areas, the analysis finds that 14 low income programs would be terminated. These include housing assistance for the elderly and handicapped, emergency food and shelter programs aimed at relieving hunger and homelessness, the legal services program, the low income weatherization program, rural housing programs, the Work Incentive Program (which provides job training to welfare mothers) and the community services block grant.

Total funds appropriated for the low income programs that would be terminated came to $4 billion this year.

In addition, in a number of low income programs the cuts would start to be made immediately under the new budget. The analysis reports that some or all of the funds appropriated for 15 low income programs in FY 1986 would be rescinded (or cancelled) under the budget. Approximately $7 billion in appropriations in the low income area would be rescinded.

The rescissions in low income programs constitute more than 60 percent of all rescissions requested in the entire federal budget.

Housing, Job Training, and Nutrition Programs Hit

Among the areas affected most severely would be housing and employment programs, the analysis states.

The budget would rescind or defer 70 percent of all funds appropriated for HUD subsidized housing in FY 1986, and then provide no appropriations at all for HUD subsidized housing in FY 1987. In addition, rural housing programs at the Department of Agriculture, which are targeted on low and moderate income rural families, would be eliminated.

In another proposed reduction in the low income housing area, rents would be raised for hundreds of thousands of low income families in existing section 8 housing. This would be accomplished by requiring these families to pay most or all of any rent increases imposed by landlords next year. For large numbers of these low income families, rents would likely be raised above the current legal maximum of 30 percent of income.

The reductions in housing for low income families and elderly and disabled persons would not be matched by similar treatment of housing for the military, however. Appropriations for military housing would be raised 21 percent next year (and 65 percent by FY 1991), while appropriations for low income housing were being zeroed out.

In the job training area, the Job Corps, program to train disadvantaged, low income youth would be cut nearly in half, and the summer youth employment program would be reduced about one-third. (As noted, the program to provide job training to welfare mothers would be eliminated.)

Reductions would also be felt in nutrition programs. Nearly 30,000 low income pregnant women, infants, and children at nutritional risk would have to be removed next year from the women, infants, and children special food program. By fiscal year 1991, 140,000 fewer women, infants and children would be reached. In addition, funding for two emergency food programs designed to reach hungry persons with the assistance of volunteer and non-profit organizations would be ended, and the food stamp and child nutrition programs would sustain new cuts of over $1 billion a year.

Finally, the analysis reports that a proposal in the budget to raise the premiums that elderly persons must pay for Medicare coverage would require the elderly to pay nearly $200 more per year by 1991. About two-thirds of the elderly below the poverty line—more than 2 million persons—would have to pay the premium increase out of their own pockets, the Center observed.

Appendix A: Impact of Federal Budget Cuts 1981-83

440,000 low income working families were terminated from the Aid to Families with Dependent Children Program (AFDC) and several hundred thousand had benefits reduced according to the General Accounting Office (GAO). Eighty percent of those terminated were still living on below poverty incomes two years later. Most of these families are also lost Medicaid coverage and, thus, access to any health care coverage.

Rents were raised for all moderate and low income families and elderly persons living in public or subsidized housing from 25% to 30% of income by 1986. This averages $500 in additional costs to a household annually in 1986. Federal support for activities to help replenish the shrinking stock of low rent housing has been cut by two-thirds. According to the Urban Institute, 300,000 more families now live in substandard housing as a result of these reductions.

$1 to $2 billion per year has been cut from the Food Stamp Program due to cuts enacted in 1981 and 1982. Over two-thirds of these reductions have come from reducing benefits to households below the poverty line according to CBO.

Overall funding for employment and training programs which stood at more than $9 billion in 1980 now comes to less than $4 billion; hardest hit have been the public service jobs program which was abolished, leaving more than 500,000 who had been served without employment opportunity and the Job Corps and WIN programs which serve unemployed youth and public assistance recipients respectively and have seen their funding reduced by 40% in real dollars in comparison with 1981 levels.

Estimates by the Children's Defense Fund show that over 200 community health centers cut back on services as a result of 1981 funding reductions and that 725,000 persons, result of 1981 funding reductions and that 725,000 persons, two-thirds of them low income children or women of child bearing age, lost access to services.

Reduction of 25% in real terms in Social Services Block Grant Program has denied thousands of low income families access to federally supported day care services and reduced the services available to the homebound elderly and the disabled.

About 2 million fewer children currently eat school lunches each day as a result predominantly of a 28% reduction in child nutrition program spending in 1981. In addition, moderate income families now pay an overage of $100 more a year for their children's school lunches.

Cutbacks in Medicaid forced many states to make corresponding reductions in both eligibility and coverage for some medical services.

Estimates by the Washington Council of Lawyers, a non-profit organization, found that some 375 legal services offices closed nationwide and that a 30% reduction in the number of attorneys and paralegals serving the poor occurred as a result of major federal funding reductions.

While total loss to New York State in select Grants-in-Aid to State and Local Governments and Non-Grant Entitlements will total approximately $1.1 (not including certain non-exempt programs such as subsidized housing programs and General Revenue Sharing), our major concern is the some $300 million is select low income program loss for the most vulnerable. ATTACHMENT/NEW YORK STATE POVERTY AND RELATED FIGURES

In 1980, 13.4% of New York's population had incomes below poverty (10,609 for a family of four).

25% of Black families in New York live below poverty and 32% of Hispanic families.

In New York City, the poverty rate overall is 24%, with Black poverty at 29.3% and Hispanic poverty rates—possibly as high as 45% (based on 1982 study by Community Service Society).

Over one-half of New York's poor are children or elderly over the age of 65.

3.6 million New Yorkers live at 125% of poverty or below. While most are likely eligible for Food Stamp Program benefits, only 50% actually participate.

1.5 million total New Yorkers have no health care coverage. 400,000 of them live at or below poverty another 390,000 are near poor. Of the 400,000 poor uninsured, 25% are children. 80% of the full uninsured population are either employed or from working households.

The WIC Program in New York State serves only slightly over 40% of the eligible population.

The total public assistance grant to a family of four (including the basic grant and the maximum shelter allowance) in New York City is $597 monthly or 67.5% of the monthly poverty income figure of $884 (this includes last year's state increase in the basic grant level through a home energy allowance).

Even when a maximum food stamp allotment is included in the total benefit level for a family of four receiving public assistance, the monthly benefit level is only 83.7% of poverty (studies show that nationwide many AFDC households do not routinely receive food stamps).

In a report by the Montefiore Medical Center, nearly one-half of the people interviewed at 29 emergency food sites reported being hungry at some point and not being able to obtain food.

There was a 50% increase in the number of emergency food sites in New York in 1984, but a 75% increase in demand according to the New York State Committee Against Hunger.

The infant mortality rates for New York were 10.8 per 1,000 live births among whites in 1980 and nearly twice as high 20.0 per 1,000 live births for blacks.

The number of homeless people in New York City on a given night is as high as 60,000 according to the Coalition for the Homeless.

APPENDIX D

I. Some Facts—About Defense Spending and the Deficit: [1]

The growth rate in the Defense Budget since 1981 has annually averaged 8.5 percent above inflation.

Defense outlays will reach their highest peacetime level in real terms in FY 86 since 1954 even after the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings cuts are considered.

The Defense Budget has become inefficient and bloated to the point that it cannot be managed properly. Money is appropriated so quickly that it cannot be spent by the Pentagon. Unobligated appropriations from previous years carried forward to 1986 now have reached $51 billion.

While the deficit had increased by approximately $132 billion in the period FY 1980–1985 while defense spending has risen by $152 billion over the same period.

There is extraordinary waste and mismanagement within the procurement process at the Department of Defense (DOD). With more than $200 billion in DOD procurements, estimates show that over 20 percent of this spending could be saved through improved management and the elimination of waste and fraud.

It is likely in FY 87 that the Defense Department will attempt to compensate for automatic FY 86 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings cuts by asking for $314 billion in Defense budget authority. When compared to DOD's budget authority after the automatic FY 86 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings cuts, $314 billion would represent an 8.15 percent increase in budget authority or a dollar increase of $36 billion.

II. Some Facts—About Corporate Tax Expenditures and the Defense: [2]

Corporate "tax expenditures" have grown from a mere $8.3 billion in 1970 to an estimated $199.9 billion in the Fiscal Year 1986.

In 1960, corporate taxes comprised 25 percent of the nation's revenue base, by 1984 that figure was down to 8.5 percent.

That $119.9 billion in corporate tax subsidies represents well over one-half of the estimated federal budget deficit for FY 87.

The corporate income tax is now more loophole than tax. The estimated costs of corporate tax breaks in FY 86 amounts to $1.69 for every $1.00 corporations are expected to pay in federal income tax.

The cost of $119.9 billion in corporate tax loopholes adds up to $1,512 for every taxpaying individual or family in America.

The 1981 Economic Recovery and Tax Act firmly institutionalized many of these corporate tax expenditures. Overall ERTA has had the effect of reducing government revenues by $208 billion in FY 86, almost the entire size of the deficit.

Impact:

Under these proposals new budget authority for HUD would drop by almost ⅔, while actual spending (outlays) would fall from $15 billion in 1986 to $14 billion in 1987. If deferrals and rescissions fail to go through, outlays for the two years would be about $2.7 billion. Spending would continue to decline until it levels off at about $12 billion. By 1991, HUD programs will account for 1.1 percent of all federal outlays, down from 2.2 percent in 1981.

An estimated 4.2 million low-income households received some sort of HUD subsidy in 1986. The total is expected to grow to 4.4 million by 1991.

Response:

1. Since 1981, the low-income housing programs of HUD and the Farmers Home Administration have received more cuts than any other human service area. The Congress should respond by (i) rejecting proposals rescind and/or defer funds already appropriated for FY 1986 (ii) rejecting the recommendation to gut the housing programs for FY 1987 and (iii) restore the share of federal expenditures (2.2 percent) for housing to levels that prevail prior to the deep cuts in 1981.

2. Unless we as a society are prepared to accept the permanency of homelessness, substandard conditions, sever rent hardships and over-crowding for growing numbers of people, we need to expand federal assistance to those unable to find decent and affordable housing. New housing proposals such as the Nehemiah Homeownership Demonstration and the two-tier program for emergency and transitional housing for the homeless should be enacted.

3. The Congress should view homelessness as a national disaster and provide immediate relief for all in need. Funds for the Emergency Food and Shelter Program administered by the Federal Management Administration (FEMA) should be re-appropriated allowing for "brick and mortar" shelter expansion as well as for food and other emergency needs.

4. There is a disproportionate amount of sub-standard housing in rural America—some 38 percent of the nations "bad housing" is in rural communities. The federal Rural Housing and Community Development programs administered by the Farmers Home Administration must be continued. HUD programs do not respond to the special credit needs of rural America.

If the President's proposed rescission of the Farmers Home Administration Program is accepted, New York State will lose $31 million of low and very low-income housing funds that are allocated for use in the state for this fiscal year. This will represent a 67 percent reduction from the previous fiscal year. The proposed elimination of the rural housing programs in the President's 1987 budget cannot be accepted. Without the Farmers Home Administration assistance the housing needs of rural New Yorkers will not be met.

5. Proper incentives for the preservation of existing predominately low-income housing projects and the creation of new predominately low-income housing projects must be a part of tax reform consideration.

Legislation regarding multifamily housing bond financing must:

1. provide adequate targeting for setting aside low-income units with rents restricted to no more than 30 percent of the maximum qualifying income:

2. a just income by family size for qualified low-income tenants:

3. restrict use for a minimum of 15 years;

4. prohibit the use of IDB funds to finance any development in which low or very low-income people are or will be displaced by those of higher income;

5. allow local and state initiated efforts to use Single Room Occupancy and other nontraditional housing resources to house the homeless;

6. ensure that the mix of the unit sizes of the low-income set aside units mirrors the distribution of the market units.

6. Since 1974 the CDBG has been a cornerstone for the improvement and expansion of housing opportunities for low- and moderate-income Americans. The Administrations proposal to defer $500 from the FY 1986 allocation should be rejected. In fact, the CDBG should be appropriated at $3.6 billion, the level set forth in the 1983 authorization bill. Furthermore, CDBG funds should be targeted so that 100 percent of the funds benefit low and moderate-income people at the local level. Adequate provisions should be added to protect against displacement and guarantee compliance with CDBG regulations.

LOW-INCOME HOUSING

OVERVIEW

From the Great Depression of the 1930's until 1981 the role of the federal government in providing housing had been expanding through a wide range of programmatic initiatives. In 1949 the Congress set for itself the goal of providing a "decent home and suitable living environment for every American." Along with the FHA and VA mortgage insurance programs, the federal government assisted low and moderate income households through public housing, Section 8 rent subsidies, loans for rural housing development, funds for the construction of housing for the elderly and handicapped (Sec. 202) as well as support funds to localities under the Community Development Block Grant Program. (CDBG)

In 1981 the President's Commission on Housing issued a report that maintained that there is a sufficient supply of adequate housing in the United States. The report recommended that the expansion of housing opportunities for lower-income people through new construction and substantial rehabilitation be severely curtailed. It suggested that the role of the federal government be reduced to a "voucher" program (non-entitlement) to assist households with the affordability of existing units.

What Has Happened to Funding:

The passage of the 1981 Budget and Reconciliation Act (Gramm-Latta) cut the housing programs of the U.S. Dept. of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) by 60 percent. The multifamily new production program under Section 8 stopped being funded in that year. Also, the payment-of-rent for tenants was increased from 25 percent of income to 30 percent. In 1983 the statute authorizing Section 8 for new construction and substantial rehabilitation was repealed (except where it works to build housing for older people or the handicapped), leaving only the Section Certificate Program for Existing Housing.

In preparation for the current FY1986 budget year, the Administration proposed a "moratorium" on adding any more units to the nation's subsidized supply. It even failed to ask for any "vouchers"! Although the Congress rejected this approach—funding about 100,000 additional assisted units—housing did suffer more cuts. The biggest losses were in the rural housing programs—a 30 percent cut over the previous year! The FY1986 HUD Appropriations bill called for 12,000 units of Sec. 202 housing for the elderly/handicapped (same as FY1985); 5,000 units of public housing (same); 32,000 Section 8 Certificates (down 5,500); 36,000 vouchers (down 2,500); 5,000 units of Section 8 Moderate Rehabilitation. The CDBG was cut 10% to $3.124 billion and a 25 percent cut for the Urban Development Action Grant Program (UDAG) to $330 million. The relatively new Sec. 17 Rental Rehabilitation Program and the Housing Development Grant Program (HODAG) were cut in half and funded at $75 million each. The Emergency Food and Shelter program at FEMA was funded at $70 million.

The Executive Budget Proposals for FY 1987:

While offering mostly a repeat of last year's budget proposals, the Administration this year will have the advantage of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings balanced budget act with which to batter congressional resistance. The Executive Budget asks for 50,000 vouchers to replace the current programs of HUD and FmHA. The Administration proposes to eliminate FmHA altogether and fold rural housing into HUD. Section 8 Certificate and voucher fair market rents would be frozen at 1986 levels. Public housing modernization funds would be cut back to allow for emergency repairs only. The CDBG would be cut by 30 percent. However, the Administration has temporarily abandoned proposals to "sell" the assets of the popular FHA.

Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Cuts for FY 1986:

Some 2,435 units of low-income housing will be cut from the present HUD program levels and 2,100 will be cut from the rural housing programs of the FmHA as a result of the 4.3 percent across-the-board cut.

Furthermore, the Administration has requested additional deferrals and rescissions for about 70 percent of the current HUD and FmHA programs—eliminating the Sec. 202 program—leaving about 54,000 vouchers out of the appropriated 100,000 units.

CHILDREN IN POVERTY: AN OVERVIEW

Through the leadership of individuals like Senator Moynihan and Congressman Rangel, increased attention is being focused on the number of children in this country who are growing up in poverty.

Even though we understand that nationally much information has been developed on this significant problem, we have summarized here for your information important findings abut problems faced by young people in New York State.

Twenty-six percent of New York State's children under 18 are poor. One of every two black and one of every three Hispanic children are poor. Over a quarter of New York's children under age 18, but even more of those under age five, are poor—four percent above the national average.

Impoverished is the single word which best described New York State's children in the 1980's. Between 1970 and 1983, the state's poverty rate among those under 18 rose 13 percent. Over half of the increase occurred between 1980 and 1983, when an additional 350,000 children fell below the poverty line. Today, 1,236,800 children in New York State live in poverty. Poverty rates are highest among our youngest children. A child born in New York State in 1970 had a one in ten chance of being poor. Today, a child's chances of being born into povery are nearing one in three.

The U.S. official poverty line is adjusted annually to account for cost-of-living increases. In 1984, the poverty line for a family of four was set at $10,609. An individual working full time at minimum wage makes $7,000 annually, $3,609 below the poverty line.

SPECIFIC AREAS OF CONCERN

Public Assistance

Over 500,000 children living in poverty in New York State do not receive public assistance. Benefit and eligibility levels have not kept pace with inflation. In 1973, 86 percent of all poor children in New York State received public assistance. The 1981 Federal budget cuts reduced public assistance benefits for 100,000 children in the State. 41,000 children lost their benefits completely; 33,000 in New York City alone. Today, ADC is reaching 737,237 children—only 59 percent of New York State's poor children.

Two-thirds of all New York's poor children live in female headed households. There are 666,000 single-parent families in New York State; 90 percent are headed by women. Fifty-seven percent of all female headed households are poor.

Medical

Although Medicaid is a Federal program, each State sets its own eligibility levels. in New York, these levels have not kept pace with inflation. New York State's Medicaid eligibility criteria discriminate against large families, denying coverage to over 100,000 poor children. In 1966, families with incomes 85 percent above the poverty line received Medicaid benefits. For uninsured children, health care remains crisis oriented. Routine check-up and basic immunizations are out of reach. New York's infant mortality and prenatal care data reveals a serious crisis. 2,856 infants in New York State died before their first birthday. In 1982, New York State had the 11th highest infant mortality rate, and 12th highest rate of low birthweight babies among the 50 States. Low birthweight infants are three times more likely to suffer from birth defects, 10 times more likely to be mentally retarted, and have mortality rates 20 times higher than normal birthweight infants.

Of all 50 States, New York has the highest percentage of women receiving late or no prenatal care to minority women. Only South Dakota supplied less prenatal care to minority mothers that year.

Every dollar invested in prenatal care may save as much as $3.38 in later health care costs.

Hunger

The mother's nutrition is a critical factor in the infant's birthweight. 609,000 women, infants and children are eligible for WIC benefits, but funds are too limited. Even with state supplementary program, 329,000 receive no benefits. Although New York State is one of the only States that offers WIC supplemental nutrition assistance programs, these combined State and Federal benefits only reach 280,000 persons, or 45.9 percent of those eligible. For every $1.00 invested in WIC, studies show a $5.00 savings in hospital costs for premature and low-weight babies. The spectre of hunger is with us again, yet over a half-million New York State children who are eligible for food stamps are not receiving them. Federal budget cuts eliminated 120,000 children from free school lunch programs between 1981 and 1983.

Child Care

Subsidized child care is an essential support to low income families, aiding self-sufficiency and providing a crucial educational head start. Statewide, only one out of five children whose families earn less than $15,000 a year receives a child care subsidy. As of 1983, 33 of the State's counties provided no day care for non-welfare recipients. Federal cuts in title XX block grant moneys resulted in a $25 million reduction and a cut of 12,000 day care slots between 1981-83. Upstate, as many as 46 percent of all children previously in publicy funded day care lost sudsidies due to Federal budget cuts. The State estimates 260,370 children 0-12 years old have parents who are either working or in training and earn less than $15,000 a year. However, State subsidized child care serves on 46,300 children monthly in New York City; 6,062 in the rest of the States.

Head Start, the federally supported program found effective in reducing drop out rates, truancy and school failure is so underfunded that 90 percent of all children eligible for Head Start programs cannot be enrolled.

Homelessness

Homelessness is now epidemic in New York City, at crisis proportions in affluent Westchester County and increasing throughout the State. Federal cuts in housing programs and the negative economics of the low-income housing market have combined to leave thousands of people homeless. Twice as many New York City families are homeless today than in 1983.

During 3 months in 1985, 5,800 families and 17,000 children sought emergency shelter in New York City. Four hundred families with 800 children in Westchester County are living in shelters with average stays of 8 months per family. The homeless include an estimated 20,000 youth pushed out of their homes or discharged from institutions, without resources, in need of jobs, training and education. They are the fastest growing population of homeless. Their needs are immediate shelter and continued services, as well as permanent housing. The Federal Runaway and Homeless Act provides base funding for shelters for this group.

Education

Our schools today fail too many young people—those who need special support services and education, young women who wish to compete in a male-dominated world, minority and poor students who need the confidence of teachers to work and succeed, and homeless youth who are shuttled from school to school or excluded from an education because they lack a residence.

Today, 33 percent of the State's students drop out before graduation—an increase from 25 percent a decade ago. The figures are far worse for our big cities: the New York City Board of Education places the rate at 41.7 percent. Retention rates for Rochester, Syracuse, and Poughkeepsie showed that over 40 percent of the entering 9th grade class is not present in 12th grade 4 years later. Dropout rates among blacks and Hispanics are over 50 percent. Ninety percent of handicapped students are not receiving diplomas.

The Federal role in primary and secondary education has always been small, but its focus has ensured that localities served the most vulnerable with compensatory, bi-lingual and special education, and that rights to equal access and equality of educational opportunities are respected.

In 1982-83, Federal Chapter 1 funds, which underpin compensatory education, reached less than half of those eligible for service. NAEP attributes this reduction of 40 percent of the gap in achievement in the 1970's to the Federal program.

Studies have demonstrated that high quality bi-lingual education can improve the achievement level of students with limited English proficiency. But current programs reach only one-third of those in need.

The Federal act for Handicapped Education Public Law 94-142 has revolutionized education of handicapped students. Federal funding in recent years has been reduced from 18 percent of costs to 8 percent of costs. In response, some States have reduced their programs.

Youth Unemployment

New York's teenage unemployment rate is 25 percent; for black and Hispanic youth the rate is over 40 percent. A recent estimate showed 260,000 of New York City's 16 to 24-year-olds lacking basic employability skills; 160,000 were out of school. Forty-five percent of Federal youth employment and training funds were cut between 1981 and 1983.

In addition to the generalized concerns that we have outlined earlier in this session, it is particularly our concern for the low income children in the State that has led us to develop our proposal for An Omnibus Anti-Poverty Initiative, detailed in another section of this Briefing Book.

AN OMINBUS ANTI-POVERTY INITIATIVE

With national poverty rates at over 14 percent and poverty in New York hovering between 13 percent and 14 percent, we recommend that Congress develop an "Omnibus Anti-Poverty Initiative". While States can act independent and creatively to develop programs and policies that complement federal programs, cushion Federal dollar loss, fill service gaps or supplement Federal efforts with State dollars, they cannot and should not substitute for the Federal Government in developing unified nationwide policies to address poverty.

The alarming growth of poverty nationwide over the last 5 years is just as significant a national issue as lowering the federal deficit. Providing health care for the uninsured, creating jobs, housing the homeless, feeding the hungry, providing adequate supports for the working poor and those who want to work and, indeed, insuring a standard of decency for every American should not be a secondary national policy issue. We cannot simply close our eyes hoping that the problem will disappear nor can we defend a rationale that states that all Americans will be assured with economic decency, much less prosperity, by a thriving economy when all the evidence is to the contrary. We must provide for those children, the elderly, women, minorities and, indeed, workers who have been "immune" to our prospering economy and for whom a Federal safety net is little more than fiction.

We urge that the Congress, in addition to addressing our Nation's growing deficit, create the financial latitude within the budget through tax base expansion and defense savings to fund a Federal "Omnibus Anti-Poverty Initiative" at a level of $15-$20 billion. Much of what we propose is contained in the Family Economic Security Act of 1985, introduced last year by Senator Moynihan, Representative Rangel and Representative Ford. Other aspects of our "Omnibus Anti-Poverty Initiative" are new initiatives. On the whole, we believe that a program such as this would be representative of a true attempt to address growing poverty as a nation. Our proposal is a blending of historically proven approaches and new innovative approaches to poverty and we urge the members of the New York State Congressional Delegation and others to support the provisions or some beginning elements of them as outlined below.

Increase SSI benefit levels and offer partial Federal support to States which increase or initiate State Supplemental SSI benefits. Mandate medicaid coverage for all SSI recipients. By increasing SSI benefit levels by $24/month for an individual and $30/month for a couple, poverty would be lessened among the elderly and disabled poor. Also, by providing Federal matching of 30 percent for increases in State Supplements for SSI, States would be encouraged to implement supplemental payments where currently non-existent and to maintain the currency of State supplemental efforts where they are provided. Medicaid benefits should be automatically provided to SSI recipients—currently states have the option of covering SSI recipients under medicaid.

IN THE AREA OF HEALTH CARE

Mandate a 1-year Federal extension of medicaid for all families who leave AFDC and have no health insurance and permit states at their own option to extend coverage for an additional year. This would be particularly beneficial to those who leave AFDC in order to work but have no fringe benefit package and to those who lose AFDC eligibility because of increased earnings.

Waive the provisions under the current Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) that prevents states from mandating employer-based health coverage. Currently States are prohibited from finding creative ways to provide health care coverage to workers and particularly the working poor by Federal legislation that does not give them latitude over employers in regard to requiring the provision of health care. Nationwide over 35 million persons, and in New York estimates ranging from 1.5-2.0 million persons, have no health insurance from any source. Many of these uncovered are poor and a significant majority are from working households.

IN THE AREA OF EMPLOYMENT

Create a new Federal block grant to support State job creation and job placement efforts for the structurally unemployed. Targeting efforts to women on AFDC and long-term adult AFDC recipients. Maintain and increase the targeted jobs tax credit (TJTC) focused on employing disadvantaged youth and general assistance recipients.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM 1986

On behalf of the Roman Catholic Bishops and Dioceses of New York State, the New York State Catholic Conference presents its program of legislative proposals for 1986. These objectives are firmly rooted in the Gospel values which motivate and guide the Church's activities in the public forum in responding to human needs.

The common thread which runs through all of these objectives is the inherent worth and dignity of every human life. The unborn, the elderly, teenage mothers, students, the hungry and homeless, Medicaid recipients, the unemployed and imprisoned—all possess rights which must be observed; all deserve respect, nurturance and protection. All public policy should be developed, all legislation enacted, and all regulations reviewed with the inestimable significance of human life at the forefront of discussion.

The State and the Church must cooperate to protect and enhance human lives at all stages of their development. It must be recognized that social responsibility and public morality often rise above personal freedoms. Further, effective public policy cannot be developed in a solely secular environment. The public and private sectors must cooperate in their efforts to restructure the law to respond beneficially and appropriately to those New Yorkers most vulnerable, most oppressed, most in need.

The Conference stands ready to participate actively in the development of such policies.

TARGETED OBJECTIVES

The Conference has selected the following specific objectives to be targeted for action during the 1986 Session. Both the Church and the State have responsibility to promote these programs as fair and sound public policy.

Protecting Human Life—Seeking primarily the elimination of the state funding of abortions and, as in the past, the transfer of such funds to programs which aid women in carrying their pregnancies to term, the Conference will support legislation requiring parental notification for abortions and programs of pre-natal care which allow women, especially those of low-income, the security of bringing their pregnancies to term. The Conference will continue to oppose the enactment of a death penalty statute as well as any right-to-die legislation which would tend toward the legalization of suicide or euthanasia.

Feeding and Housing the Indigent—The Conference will seek funding of the SNAP program at a level of $50 million to provide additional funds for nutrition outreach, the WIC program, meals for the homebound elderly, support for soup kitchens and food pantries, and school food programs.

In addition, efforts will be undertaken to continue the Homeless Housing Assistance Program funded at a level of $30 million for FY 86-87 as well as the creation of an operating subsidy program funded at a level of $2 million in 1986-87 to enhance effective operation of existing programs.

Fostering Educational Choice—To continue the efforts of last year, the Conference will cooperate with other groups to attain enactment of a program of educational tax relief for parents of children attending public or nonpublic elementary and secondary schools.

Ensuring Medical Care—While seeking an increase in the Medicaid eligibility levels to reach 100 percent of the federal poverty level, special efforts will be undertaken to secure the provision of Medicaid services for families of all sizes, especially those headed by single women, with incomes below the federal poverty level and to obtain expeditious determination of Medicaid eligibility for alternative care programs for the elderly and disabled.

Serving Youth—The Conference will seek enactment of Omnibus Youth Services legislation which among other provisions would provide additional funds for children's mental health services; increase funding for the STEP program with provision that it be targeted to minorities, those at risk for teen pregnancy, and residents of group and foster homes; establish a special student scholarship program of tuition payments for at-risk youth for attendance at either a non-district public school or a nonpublic school; increase by $5 million the appropriation for the State's Teen Pregnancy Prevention Program; increase funding for preschool and after-school day care programs; and create a Family Support Program for families on or eligible for public assistance experiencing symptoms of dysfunction and in need of counseling and case-management services.

Employing the Unemployed—The Conference will support the creation of a state employment program, subsidizing and expanding a grant diversion program targeted to employable public assistance recipients.

SPECIAL LEGISLATIVE CONCERNS

While the targeted objectives will receive major emphasis in the 1986 Session, the Conference will also direct efforts toward protecting the following populations through pursuit of the initiatives enumerated below.

Elderly and Disabled—Increase respite funding to families caring for elderly and physically disabled dependents; expand the availability of transportation services; provide appropriate recreational opportunities and services.

Encourage family support services for those rendering home care to the mentally disabled as well as for persons with disabilities who require care as their parents become less able to care for them.

Revise CSS eligibility requirements to allow provision of services to persons who have not been previously institutionalized.

Women in the Workplace—Eliminate gender-based wage disparity in the work place.

Provide skills training for women re-entering the job market.

Develop adequate child care policies for all working women.

Disadvantaged Children—Enact legislation to provide supplementary services for pupils with special educational needs in nonpublic schools.

The Physically Ill—Maintain the funds provided in the hospital-based reimbursement methodology, which include provisions for bad debt and charity care.

Support medical malpractice reform which alleviates the financial burden placed on hospitals for the cost of physicians' liability insurance; freezes any immediate adjustment in malpractice insurance rates; assures accessibility to health care services for all; and provides for the establishment of a Commission on Liability Insurance.

Support provisions for adequate payment of alternate care patients, regulatory protections of possible inappropriate discharges, and increased availability of home care services.

Support an increase of at least $5.00 for clinic rates, elimination of the cap on outpatient services, and increases for emergency room rates.

Victims and Offenders—Continue to pursue legislative initiatives to reduce prison overcrowding, with concern for both victims and offenders, proposing criminal justice reform that makes common sense for both. This would entail increased use of community-based alternatives to incarceration for young offenders and persons who pose no danger to society, so as to reduce recidivism and promote community reintegration and safety.

Families—Maintain and improve the state's existing housing stock through increased funding for neighborhood and rural preservation companies, removing the cap on funds to individual companies, and developing new rehabilitation initiatives including the SRO Preservation Loan Program, a state-financed public housing modernization program, and a program for moderate rehabilitation of occupied buildings.

Expand middle and low-income housing opportunities for elderly and disabled residents.

The Oppressed—Support efforts to monitor and curb the investment of public retirement funds in firms doing business with the Republic of South Africa. It should be made clear that investments and bank loans to South Africa carry grave moral burdens and have critical impact on issues of human rights.

The concerns outlined above do not exhaust the full legislative program of the New York State Catholic Conference. A "General Legislative Agenda," specifying all of the proposals which the Conference will actively pursue in the 1986 Session, is available from the Conference office.)

TAX CARRYOVER LIMITATION ACT

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, Senator CHAFEE and I are pleased to be introducing legislation to address a problem in the Internal Revenue Code that Congress has grappled with since 1976. Specifically, I am referring to Code sections 382 and 383 which limit the use of a corporation's net operating loss and other carryovers following a substantial change in the stock ownership of the corporation.

The need to revise section 382 to curb abuses and eliminate discontinuities and uncertainties under current law has been apparent for many years. It is the solution that has eluded us. In the last few years, however, a growing consensus has emerged on an approach to the carryover of net operating losses. This approach first surfaced in a 1982 study by the American Law Institute entitled "Federal Income Tax Project: Subchapter C." Subsequently, a task force composed of tax practitioners, academicians, and professional staff from the Joint Committee on Taxation and the Department of the Treasury joined together with the staff of the Senate Finance Committee to prepare a report on proposals to revise the taxation of corporations and shareholders. Last year, the staff of the Senate Finance Committee released its final report on subchapter C, including specific suggestions for the revision of sections 382 and 383 based on substantial refinements and modifications to the American Law Institute's 1982 study.

The bill I am introducing draws heavily from the Senate Finance Committee's subchapter C report for new principles and guidelines to govern the carry over of net operating losses. I note that the tax reform bill recently passed by the House of Representatives also adopts the general principles proposed in the subchapter C report for dealing with such operating losses. In addition, the tax reform proposals just released by Senator PACKWOOD include revisions to sections 382 and 383 that are substantially the same as those embodied in my bill.

Mr. President, before turning to a discussion of the provisions in my bill, I would like to publicly thank all of the people—both in Government and from the private sector—who contributed so much time and effort to the Senate Finance Committee's subchapter C report. A complete list of these people can be found in Senator CHAFEE's opening remarks at the September 30, 1985, hearing on the subchapter C report held by the Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management of the Committee on Finance. In recent months, many of these people contributed to the development of my bill and deserve particular recognition. These people are George Yin and Lindy Paull from the Finance Committee; LaBrenda Stodghill, Laurie Mathews, and Paul Jacokes from the Joint Committee on Taxation; Jim Fransen and Mark Mathiesen from the office of Legislative Counsel; and Rick D'Avino from the Department of the Treasury.

Normally, when describing proposed legislation, I would start with a description of current law. Unfortunately, it is extremely difficult to identify current law under the circumstances presently surrounding sections 382 and 383. As part of the Tax Reform Act of 1976, Congress completely rewrote section 382 and 383. Since then, we have postponed, time and again, the effective dates of the 1976 amendments because they suffer from the same basic flaws as pre-1976 sections 382 and 383, as well as a host of additional inadequacies. The latest postponement of the effective dates expired on December 31, 1985. As a result, the 1976 amendments to sections 382 and 383 are technically the law today.

This problem is further compounded by the tax reform bill passed by the House of Representatives in December. As mentioned earlier, that bill contains new rules governing the carryover of corporate tax attributes following certain changes in stock ownership. These rules are embodied in amendments to sections 382 and 383, and are effective to changes in corporate ownership that occurred on or after January 1, 1986.

Mr. President, the situation I have just described is an excellent example of the type of confusion created by the effective dates in the House tax reform bill. In planning for a transaction, should a taxpayer rely on the 1976 amendments which are technically the law, but which almost everyone agrees should never take effect? If not, should the taxpayer rely on the provisions of the House bill which represent a sound policy improvement over the 1976 amendments and pre-1976 law, but which have not yet been acted upon by the Senate? Or perhaps the taxpayer should rely on pre-1986 law which, in fact, has been the law through December 31, 1985, notwithstanding the 1976 amendments? In my opinion, we can surely provide taxpayers with a modicum of certainly better than this.

For purposes of my statement, I will refer to pre-1976 law as current law. Under current law, a corporation that incurs a net operating loss in 1 year generally is permitted to use the loss of offset income earned in the 3 taxable years prior to and the 15 years after the year in which the loss is incurred. The underlying policy for this treatment is to ameliorate the otherwise harsh consequences of a strict annual accounting system. In 1954, section 382 was added to the Internal Revenue Code to curb trafficking in corporations with unused net operating losses following certain changes in the ownership of the corporation. One set of rules applies in cases of ownership changes by taxable stock purchase or redemption, and the other set of rules applies to acquisitions by tax-free reorganization.

The purchase rule provides that no carryover of net operating losses is permitted if: First, the 10 largest shareholders of a loss corporation own a percentage of stock in the corporation which is at least 50 percentage points more than they owned at any time within the two preceding taxable years, and second, the loss corporation does not continue to carry on substantially the same trade or business after the change in stock ownership. Absent either of these conditions, the net operating loss carryovers of a corporation are unaffected by a change in ownership resulting from a purchase or redemption of stock. In contrast, the reorganization rule limits the carryover of net operating losses following certain tax-free reorganizations if the stock in the acquiring corporation that is received by shareholders of the loss corporation represents less than 20 percent of the stock of the surviving corporation. In such a case, the net operating loss carryovers of the loss corporation are reduced by 5 percent for each percentage point below 20 percent of the stock of the surviving corporation received by loss corporation shareholders.

In addition to these specific rules, net operating loss and other carryovers can be subject to limitations following changes in stock ownership under a variety of additional rules. First, section 269 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to disallow carryovers if the principal purpose of an acquisition of a corporation is tax avoidance by securing the benefit of the losses or excess credits. Limitations may also be imposed under the so-called "Libson Shops" doctrine, based on a 1957 Supreme Court decision [(Libson Shops, Inc. v. Kehler, 353 U.S. 382 1957)] which held that, under pre-1954 law, net operating losses would not survive a statutory merger unless the losses were offset against income earned after the merger that was attributable to the same business that produced the loss. Subsequent court decisions are divided over the continuing validity of the Libson Shops case in light of the statutory changes made in 1954. Finally, the consolidated return regulations restrict the use of net operating loss and other carryovers where a loss corporation is acquired by a consolidated group of corporations—the separate return limitation year rules—and where there is a change in the ownership of a consolidated group of corporations that has net operating loss carryovers, the consolidated return change of ownership rules.

Critics of the current rules have argued that the law encourages trafficking in net operating loss and other carryovers. In addition, current law places a substantial premium on tax planning, discriminates between different types of acquisitions without fundamental policy reasons for such discriminations, distorts investments decisions, and creates undue bias between diversified and nondiversified entities and between old and new businesses. Finally, current law fails to provide certainty in determining the extent to which tax attributes, such as net operating loss carryovers, will survive an acquisition which are unlikely to be a reflection of actual experience for a specific corporation. On the other hand, the approach provides reasonable limitations for the utilization of carryovers following ownership changes, creates an increased level of certainty for transactions covered by its provisions, and should substantially cut down on the trafficking in loss corporations.

A number of additional provisions in my bill insure the smooth application of the new rules. The bill includes a rule designed to prevent the value of the loss corporation from being inflated in anticipation of an ownership change. In particular, any capital contribution made at any time as part of a plan the principal purpose of which is to avoid the limitations would not be taken into account in determining the value of the loss corporation. In implementing this rule, the bill provides that any capital contribution made during the 2-year period ending on the date of the ownership change would be treated as such a plan. Regulations would ameliorate this 2-year rule in appropriate circumstances such as capital contributions made upon formation of the corporation.

Other provisions of the bill include special rules governing first, loss corporations which are investment companies; second, increases or decreases in investment companies; third, the limitation on utilization of carryovers for built-in gains and losses; fourth, bankruptcy proceedings; and fifth, the repeal of the Libson Shops doctrine. I do not feel it is necessary to examine all of the provisions of the bill in detail. Rather, I wish to make a few remarks on several specific provisions.

First, my bill does not include built-in depreciation deductions as built-in losses for purposes of calculating the limitations on use of carryovers. The reason for this is quite simple—use of depreciation deductions is already spread over a period of years under the provisions of the tax laws governing depreciation deductions.

Second, my bill contains a special rule exempting certain reorganizations of failing thrifts and savings and loans from the new limits on the use of carryovers. This exemption applies only to reorganizations described in section 368(a)(3)(D)(ii), and only if the reorganization is completed before January 1, 1991. I have included this provision because a similar exception applies under current law. I am not entirely convinced that this exception is warranted, but I do believe we should address the issue specifically in the Senate Finance Committee. At the present time, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation rely heavily on the existing exception in making failing thrifts attractive investments to prospective purchasers. It is not a great secret that the FSLIC is experiencing severe financial problems. Before exacerbating its problems with a change in the tax laws, we should at a minimum have a lively debate on this issue. Finally, if it is determined to retain this type of exception, we should also examine whether a similar rule should apply to reorganizations of financially troubled banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Third, unlike the provisions of the House tax reform bill, my bill would eliminate the continuity of business requirement as a prerequisite to the carry over of net operating losses following a change in ownership.

Fourth, my bill resolves specifically the confusion over what laws are currently applicable to net operating loss carryovers by providing an effective date of January 1, 1987. At the same time, the 1976 amendments would be repealed. The result is that pre-1976 amendments would be applicable through December 31, 1986, and thereafter the provisions of my bill would apply. I do note that we may wish to consider a transition rule permitting taxpayers to elect to have the 1976 amendments apply to transactions occurring in 1986 prior to the date of enactment of my bill.

In conclusion, I believe my bill represents a significant improvement over current law, over the 1976 amendments, and over the applicable provisions of the House tax reform bill. I am hopeful that we will enact my bill quickly and finally put to rest the question of the treatment of net operating loss carryovers following substantial changes in the ownership of a corporation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire text of my bill be included in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. KASTEN):

S. 2208. A bill to establish the Africa Famine, Recovery, and Development Fund for the relief, recovery, and long-term development of sub-Saharan Africa, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AFRICA FAMINE, RECOVERY, AND DEVELOPMENT FUND ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am delighted to join Senator KASTEN in introducing today a bill similar to legislation we introduced last year to establish within the Foreign Assistance Act a permanent long-term fund for African famine recovery and development. It is patterned along the lines of legislation I offered in 1974, with the late Senator Hubert Humphrey, when we created the Sahel drought fund. That fund has, and continues to do much to assist those West African countries.

But drought and famine conditions have now spread to much of sub-Saharan Africa, and we need to broaden and strengthen the authorities in our law to assist them in a more effective and sustained fashion.

Following our legislative effort last year, Senator KASTEN and I have worked closely with the voluntary agencies, with their umbrella coalition at InterAction, and with many other experts in the field. The hope was to learn from the past and to strengthen the existing authorities in the Foreign Assistance Act, while also broadening them to include new initiatives dealing with famine recovery and development in Africa.

I believe all Americans can be proud of what our country has done over the past year and a half to help the starving peoples of Africa. U.S. aid—contributions from the church agencies, and private donations—have saved millions of lives. But we cannot afford to relax now. We must keep the pipeline filled with food, and keep the pressure on, so that help gets where it is still needed.

But equally important, we must begin to prepare now for the longer term. The central challenge today is whether the nations now suffering recurrent drought and famine in Africa can ever feed themselves again. Two decades ago, the same question was posed—and answered affirmatively—in Asia. In the 1960's the United States acted to avert repeated famine in India, but today India feeds itself, thanks to international assistance and agricultural reforms.

That is the purpose of the bill we are offering today. As in the Sahel a decade ago, this bill will help us move from an emergency relief effort to programs for rehabilitation and recovery, and finally to longer-term agricultural development. As in the Sahel, we need a longer-term authority in our foreign assistance program to launch this longer-term effort to help the African nations recover from drought and famine, to achieve agricultural development and, hopefully, to become self-sufficient in food production.

Our bill simply establishes an African famine recovery and development fund to allow the President to seek appropriations for long-term agricultural recovery and development programs, particularly for support of policy reforms and for agricultural support and research for small farmers. These goals of the fund are specified because all agree today that they are central to Africa's effort to achieve self-sufficiency in food.

The key to avoiding future famines, and to minimizing the effect of droughts when they do occur, is to pursue broad agricultural reforms. Ultimately, the African nations themselves must make a commitment to reform. However, they can do so only if they obtain help from other countries. The United States should make clear that it is ready to respond generously to nations that pursue policy reforms, and to reward them with additional assistance when they do.

Unfortunately, many governments in Africa still maintain economic and agricultural policies that favor urban consumers to the detriment of rural farmers. Prices paid to farmers are kept artificially low. Currencies are inflated, and with loans from abroad urban citizens are able to purchase inexpensive foods and goods from overseas at the expense of their own farmers. Sometimes cash crops have been promoted to support food imports at the expense of domestic crops. It will take political courage for any of these nations to reverse their policies, but we should be prepared to help those that begin the effort.

Second, the fund's authorizing language also emphasizes agricultural research and support for small farmers. There is widespread agreement that the best method to increase food production in Africa is to strengthen rural farmers, who are frequently neglected or ignored in current government programs and agricultural extension services.

Third, the bill emphasizes that the crisis in Africa requires a global initiative, and stresses the important role of international organizations and multilateral institutions, as well as the voluntary and church agencies. It recognizes that international organizations are particularly suited to undertake programs in material and child health, primary health care, refugee self-sufficiency and strengthening of host country social infrastructure, donor coordination, women's roles in African food systems, food strategy planning, replenishment of natural resources, population planning, and research related to increasing African food production. These organizations include the U.N. Development Program, UNICEF, the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, World Health Organization, Food and Agriculture Organization, and the International Fund for Agricultural Development. The work of all these organizations in Africa can be supported by this fund.

Fourth, the bill recognizes the importance of achieving better coordination of development efforts in Africa. Again, building on the Sahel experience, it mandates that an international coordinating mechanism be established for Africa and be strongly supported by our Government.

Fifth, the bill recognizes the importance of trade policies and the role of the multilateral lending institutions, such as the World Bank's Special Facility for Africa, in supporting policy reform and agricultural rehabilitation in Africa.

Mr. President, it is impossible today for us to establish an exact dollar level for these programs, even for the coming fiscal year, much less for the years to come. We are still involved in emergency operations in several countries. That is why we have simply authorized "such sums as may be necessary," while at the same time mandating that all existing programs authorized in the development assistance accounts of AID must be implemented within the guidelines contained in the new authorities established in this bill.

Although it is not possible to give a precise figure on needed funding, it is possible to establish what funds will be available next year from these accounts. Approximately $350 million is now available for Africa from existing accounts, including the Sahel fund, and up to another $650 million might come from loan reflows, development and military sales, or ESF funds—for a total of $1 billion for the coming fiscal year. Some have suggested that another $300 million—for a total of $1.3 billion—should be the target we establish for the fund.

While we may not be able to agree now on an exact figure, we know that it will be substantial if we are really to join in an international effort to help Africa feed itself in the decade to come.

Senator KASTEN and I consider this to be a "working bill"—a starting point—an effort to establish a permanent funding authority to support longer-term recovery and development in Africa. Because the lesson of past experience is that a self-sustaining future for nations dealing with drought and famine is possible only through long-term agricultural reform.

In recent years, per capita food production has been rising steadily in Asia and Latin America, but it is sharply down in Africa. Unless this basic trend is reversed, there will be no long-term progress. There is hope for Ethiopia and Sudan and other hardhit nations if the United States and the West are willing to help—not just today, but tomorrow too. That is the goal of the special fund we are establishing by this bill, and I urge the Senate to support it.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the response of both the American people and their Government to the pleas for help when much of sub-Saharan Africa was subjected to drought last year, was extraordinary and heartening.

The U.S. Government, led by the Agency for International Development, responded promptly and effectively, and deserves much of the credit for alleviating suffering and preventing starvation.

The response of the American people to pleas for financial assistance was met in a typically very generous fashion, and it is a total effort that we all can be very proud of.

Notwithstanding that effort, much remains to be done. Most of the countries of Africa live at the edge of life, their people eking out a bare subsistence on land resources constantly pressured by drought, desertification, and poor agricultural practices.

Most government policies on the continent emphasize the needs of the urban population, destroying incentives necessary for agricultural production and marketing.

The legislation Senator KENNEDY and I are introducing today represents a major effort on our part, to begin a process which hopefully will lead to the enactment of comprehensive legislation addressing the long-term recovery and development needs of sub-Saharan Africa.

Clearly, a special effort is required, and more clearly, we need a redirection in the way assistance programs are carried out on that continent.

Mr. President, I am not going to repeat the presentation already made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts on this legislation, but I would like to highlight a few of the major provisions it contains:

The legislation establishes a fund through which appropriations for development assistance would be provided, thus eliminating some of the more cumbersome aspects of providing aid under the existing functional accounts of the Foreign Assistance Act. This particular provision is very important in order to provide the administration with the flexibility required in Africa;

The legislation emphasizes both the need for agricultural research and support for small farmers, as well as the need for structural economic reforms in such areas as pricing policy, privatization of parastatals, and the development of indigenous capabilities in the areas of appropriate technology and improvement and development of production related infrastructure;

The legislation stresses the need for a global initiative through increased utilization of international organizations, multilateral institutions, as well as voluntary and church agencies. It underscores the need for donor coordination, a very important element if the overall effort is to be successful;

Funding for this initiative is obtained by the transfer of those funds which would have gone to the area through existing programs. Because of the budgetary situation, the legislation does not call for increased funding, but there is a provision which would allow for increased funding if the overall budgetary situation should change. The most important aspects of this legislation are the new authorities and flexibility they provide.

Mr. President, as Senator KENNEDY mentioned, we view this legislation as a working bill—in effect, a first draft which we hope will be the starting point for the appropriate committees to begin with as we search for long-term solutions to help the countries of Africa develop and sustain themselves.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to express my appreciation to the numerous organizations which helped in the development of this legislation, led by "interaction," the umbrella group formed by private and voluntary organizations.

Senator KENNEDY and I look forward to continuing our work on this legislation with them, as well as international organizations, the administration, the Foreign Relations Committee, and others who are interested in helping to solve the problems of Sub-Saharan Africa.

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. SIMON, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. HATCH, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. HEINZ, and Mr. WEICKER):

S. 2209. A bill to make permanent and improve the provisions of section 1619 of the Social Security Act, which authorize the continued payment of SSI benefits to individuals who work despite severe medical impairment; to amend such act to require concurrent notification of eligibility for SSI and Medicaid benefits and notification to certain disabled SSI recipients of their potential eligiblity for benefits under such section 1619; to provide for a GAO study of the effects of such section's work incentive provisions, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR DISABLED AMERICANS ACT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with my colleagues Senators DOMENICI, PRYOR, SIMON, STAFFORD, HATCH, DURENBERGER, BRADLEY, BENTSEN, HEINZ, and WEICKER the Employment Opportunities for Disabled Americans Act. The primary purpose of this bill is to permanently remove a major work disincentive, and to create a Federal environment which fosters increased employment of disabled persons.

On June 9, 1980, the Social Security Disability Amendments of 1980 were signed into law. These amendments attempted to deal with some longstanding issues of equity and efficiency in the SSDI and SSI Programs. Among the provisions within these amendments were the section 1619 Program: special SSI benefits and continuation of Medicaid for the working disabled. This 3 year demonstration was scheduled to cease at the end of 1983. The Social Security Disability Reform Act of 1984, however, extended section 1619 beyond its original expiration date, once again on a demonstration basis.

Section 1619(a) allows SSI recipients to continue to receive SSI cash payments after they begin engaging in substantial gainful activity [SGA] up to the income disregard "breakeven point." Section 1619(b) permits SSI eligible persons to retain Medicaid coverage eligibility if they continue to need Medicaid services in order to work, and if their income is not sufficient to purchase the needed medical services.

There is a growing recognition that the 1619 program could save money by encouraging persons to work who would otherwise remain on SSI throughout their lives. A recent Congressional Budget Office preliminary estimate of the cost of making 1619 permanent projects a zero-budget impact. This CBO estimate reflects the assumption that many SSI recipients who would otherwise remain on the SSI rolls for life would begin to work under the protection of a permanent 1619.

The financial advantages of enabling as SSI recipient to work are substantial. SSA estimates that a typical SSI recipient at the age of 35 years old would receive at least $200,000 in SSI income payments and health care benefits if not working by the time he became 65 years old.

In addition to making the provisions of section 1619 permanent, this bill also:

Provides for the automatic reinstatement, without delay, of individuals who are deemed eligible for SSI because of their disability if their income or medical coverage fluctuates;

Continues SSI payments to 1619 eligibles who are institutionalized for up to 60 days within a 24-month period;

Provides for the continuation of title XIX benefits to otherwise eligible children who become entitled to child's insurance benefits under section 202(d);

Requires the Social Security Administration to designate a 1619 specialist in each office where feasible;

Requires SSA to notify a disabled individual about section 1619 when the individual first becomes an SSI recipient, and again when the person's earned income exceeds $200 a month;

Requires GAO to conduct a study of the operation of section 1619 to evaluate the program's effectiveness; and Extends the Social Security Administration's authority to waive a variety of statutory requirements to test the impact on rehabilitation and employment of SSI and SSDI recipients.

Currently there are 406 persons participating in the section 1619(a) program and 6,804 persons in the 1619(b) program. There are, however, over 2.5 million disabled SSI recipients. The provisions outlined above will provide the impetus for even greater numbers of disabled Americans to become participants in the 1619 program and gainful employment.

We are just beginning to scratch the surface regarding the full potential of persons with disabilities. Industry has recognized this untapped resource and is beginning to open wide the doors to employment opportunities for disabled persons. It is up to the Federal Government to support such opportunities—opportunities for a job and all the independence, self-sufficiency, and dignity that goes with being a productive member of the community.

The legislation that I introduce today takes one more step in the long path to economic independence for disabled Americans. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring the Employment Opportunities for Disabled Americans Act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 9. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, in introducing this bill with the distinguished majority leader, Mr. DOLE, I hope to alleviate some of the disincentives that currently exist for severely disabled Americans to engage in work to the limit of their abilities. Work and the contribution that it allows the worker to provide to the society at large is enormously theraputic for all of us. It is unfortunate that some of our currently existing legislation places economic barriers in the way of disabled Americans who wish to make full use of their potential. It is fortunate, however, that our form of government allows us continuous opportunity to improve our legislation.

This bill makes permanent several changes to section 1619 of the Social Security Act that have been temporarily enacted for two 3-year periods. These changes allow severely disabled people who are receiving SSI payments to continue receiving these payments until they meet the SSI breakeven criteria for their State. The bill also continues their Medicaid eligibility indefinitely despite their employment.

In order to prevent these people from joining the ranks of the increasing numbers of homeless, this bill also provides that SSI payments will be continued throughout an institutionalization lasting no more than 60 days. This provision is particularly helpful to the severely mentally disabled who have multiple institutionalizations throughout the course of their illness. Without this provision of continuing SSI payments during their institutional stay, the severely mentally disabled may not be able to continue paying rent and will therefore lose their permanent housing. At this time over 40 percent of the homeless population are schizophrenics.

This bill addresses some longstanding problems with Social Security benefits for severely disabled Americans. While there is some potential for cost savings if a larger number of our disabled citizens obtain employment, realistically we must wait and see how this program works before we depend too heavily upon the cost-saving projections. What we can depend upon are the people-saving projections based on the enhanced self-esteem that employment will bring to severely disabled Americans.

This bill will not solve all of the problems that currently exist in our programs for the severely disabled. It will, however, provide much needed leadership from the Congress in trying new ideas in rehabilitating all severely disabled Americans and integrating them into the most productive position possible in society.

By Mr. COCHRAN (for himself, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. DOLE, Mr. KERRY, Mr. NUNN, Mr. SIMON, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. ZORINSKY, and Mr. CRANSTON):

S.J. Res. 299. Joint resolution to designate the week of December 7, 1986, through December 13, 1986, as "National Alopecia Areata Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ALOPECIA AREATA AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to designate the week of December 7, 1986, through December 13, 1986, as "National Alopecia Areata Awareness Week."

Alopecia areata, one of the most tragic diseases of our time, is an immunological disorder causing severe hair loss. Its approximately 2 million victims are mostly children and young adults, who often lose all of their hair, including eyelashes, eyebrows and body hair.

Total or partial hair loss causes a dramatic change in a alopecia victim's appearance. This is particularly hard on children, who suffer emotionally when they are teased about being different, and on young adults, who are constantly reminded that our society equates beauty with a shiny, healthy head full of hair. Without question, the disease can cause devastating psychological effects.

Alopecia areata, a Latin phrase meaning bald spot, occurs when hair follicles stop production. While little is known about the cause of alopecia, researchers believe that a malfunction of the body's immune system can cause "hibernation" of the fair follicles. There is some hope that a cure is within reach.

A week set aside to increase public awareness of this disease will enhance the research and support efforts of the National Alopecia Areata Foundation. This network of support groups in 42 States has helped thousands of victims and their families cope with the physical and emotional problems caused by alopecia areata.

I believe it is crucial to promote awareness of alopecia areata in order to work toward finding a cure and toward easing the trauma of the thousands of alopecia areata victims across the country.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort and to cosponsor my joint resolution designating "National Alopecia Areata Awareness Week."●

SENATE RESOLUTION 369—RELATING TO TRADE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

Mr. MCCONNELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 369

Whereas the exports of the Republic of Korea to the United States have grown at an average annual rate of nearly 16 percent since 1981, United States exports to the Republic of Korea grew at an average annual rate of approximately 3 percent during that period with a decrease of 2 percent in 1985.

Whereas in 1985 the United States imported from the Republic of Korea merchandise worth $10,013,085,000, the Republic of Korea only imported merchandise from the United States of a value of $5,720,136,000, resulting in a United States trade deficit of $4,292,949,000.

Whereas in 1985 the United States extended to the Republic of Korea preferential treatment under the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) program for certain products it exports to the United States worth $1,655,000,000, making the Republic of Korea the second largest beneficiary under such program.

Whereas the Republic of Korea persists in maintaining the following acts, policies, and practices which are unreasonable, unjustifiable, or discriminatory and which burden or restrict United States commerce:

(1) The domestic market of the Republic of Korea is closed to cigarettes made in the United States. It is illegal for citizens of the Republic of Korea to possess cigarettes made outside the Republic of Korea. A citizen of the Republic of Korea possessing foreign cigarettes is subject to a fine of up to $1,161.44, imprisonment, and loss of employment.

(2) The importation into the Republic of Korea of all beef and pork from the United States has been effectively banned since May 1985. Prior to the ban, the United States supplied most of the high-quality beef imported into the Republic of Korea.

(3) The Office of National Tax Administration of the Republic of Korea is scheduled to require that all distilled spirit products be manufactured with a minimum proportion of local raw materials after January 1987.

(4) The Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries of the Republic of Korea restricts the importation of many United States agricultural items by refusing to grant import approval to those items. Included in the items which are subject to such restraints and are prevented from being imported into the Republic of Korea are fresh oranges, canned fruit cocktail, grape juice, wine, alfalfa products, edible meat offals, walnuts, fresh grapes, sausages, canned beef and pork canned peaches, concentrated orange juice, other fruit juices, and canned corn and dried peas.

(5) The issuance of an import license for United States manufactured goods must have the recommendation of the Korean industry association whose members compete with the imported good. This unreasonable practice adversely affects many United States products, including agricultural chemicals, soda ash, automotive parts, cosmetics, nylon carpets, loudspeakers, electric hand tools, razors and razor blades, machine tools, personal computers, electric shavers, cameras, and construction equipment.

(6) The importation of computers and peripheral equipment that can be produced locally has been effectively banned since July 1982, by the requirement of the Republic of Korea that investment or licensing of local production of computers and peripheral equipment be made as a condition for importing computers and peripheral equipment.

(7) Tariffs imposed by the Republic of Korea remain unreasonably high on several products in which the United States has a comparative advantage, including—

(A) fresh fruits and vegetables (current tariff is 50 percent ad valorem),

(B) canned meat (current tariff is 40 percent ad valorem),

(C) cosmetics (current tariff is 40 percent ad valorem),

(D) wood products (current tariff is 20 percent ad valorem),

(E) electric hand tools (current tariff is 20 percent ad valorem),

(F) computers (current tariff is 20 percent ad valorem),

(G) automobile parts (current tariff is 30 percent ad valorem), and

(H) chocolate confectionery (current tariff is 40 percent ad valorem, falling to 30 percent ad valorem in 1988).

(8) The application of emergency tariffs, adjustment tariffs, special commodity taxes, and value added tax on top of the general tariff rate, and other fees, make many products prohibitively expensive.

(9) The entire import regime of the Republic of Korea is designed, through the use of import licenses and quotas, to discourage the importation of any seafood. The only United States product now entering the Republic of Korea in any volume comes from joint ventures, and much of this is reprocessed in the Republic of Korea and exported.

(10) The Republic of Korea unreasonably restricts the sale of United States fire insurance to only those properties outside of the 10 largest cities in the Republic of Korea, and unreasonably denies licenses to United States firms to write life insurance.

(11) The Republic of Korea unreasonably denies United States banks the ability to participate fully in the domestic financial market.

(12) The Republic of Korea does not adequately protect intellectual property.

Whereas these unreasonable, unjustifiable, and discriminatory acts, policies, and practices of the Republic of Korea burden or restrict United States commerce: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Republic of Korea should not be treated as a beneficiary developing country under the Unitd States Generalized System of Preferences until the unreasonable, unjustifiable, and discriminatory acts, policies, and practices described in the preamble of this resolution are eliminated and import restrictions imposed by the Republic of Korea are liberalized through—

(1) agreement by the Republic of Korea that the purchase and sale of imported cigarettes, and regulation thereof by the Republic of Korea and its instrumentalities, will be conducted on a nondiscriminatory and equitable basis, including repeal of the law which makes it illegal for citizens of the Republic of Korea to use or possess imported tobacco products under threat of fine, imprisonment, or loss of employment;

(2) extension of the ability to import United States tobacco leaf into the Republic of Korea to all private non-Korean entities;

(3) elimination of the ban on the importation into the Republic of Korea of beef and pork from the United States;

(4) inclusion on the Automatic Approval List of fresh oranges, canned fruit cocktail, grape juice, wine, alfalfa products, edible meat offals, walnuts, fresh grapes, sausages, canned beef and pork, canned peaches, concentrated orange juice, other fruit juices, and canned corn and dried peas;

(5) inclusion on the Automatic Approval List of agricultural chemicals, soda ash, automotive parts, cosmetics, nylon carpets, loudspeakers, electric hand tools, razors and razor blades, machine tools, personal computers, electric shavers, cameras, and construction equipment;

(6) elimination of the ban on the importation of computers and peripheral equipment that can be produced locally;

(7) reduction and binding of the general tariff rates imposed by the Republic of Korea to the levels of protection maintained by average industrialized countries, including, but not limited to, wood, wood products, and dairy commodities;

(8) elimination of the practice of discouraging the importation of seafood into the Republic of Korea;

(9) elimination of the requirement that all distilled spirit products be manufactured with a minimum proportion of local raw materials after January 1987;

(10) elimination of restrictions on the sale of United States fire insurance in the Republic of Korea;

(11) elimination of unreasonable denials of licenses to United States firms to write life insurance; and

(12) extension to United States banks of the ability to participate fully in the financial markets of the Republic of Korea.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, Benjamin Franklin was fond of stating that "No nation was ever ruined by trade." While the truth of these words is clear, the reality is that virtually every nation engages in practices and policies which, to a greater or lesser degree, limit trade as a way of protecting their domestic producers.

Nevertheless, I rise today to share with my colleagues a growing concern about what, in my view, are the excessively protectionist policies of one of America's most important Asian allies—the Republic of Korea.

I am pleased to note, Mr. President, that Korea has found a healthy market in the United States for its products. This is not only good for the Korean economy, but also the American consumer. Since the beginning of the decade, their exports to the United States have grown at an average annual rate of nearly 16 percent—reaching an all-time high of close to 30 percent in 1984.

In stark contrast, however, U.S. exports to Korea have grown at an average annual rate of only 3 percent since 1981—with a decrease of 2 percent in 1985. The result of this imbalance is that, since 1982, the United States has endured a growing trade deficit with Korea—a deficit of some $4 billion in 1985 alone.

Of course, there is nothing inherently wrong with one nation selling more goods than it buys from another. It would be implausible for me to suggest that the Korean and American economies are so similar that we should expect a standard of balanced trade between our two nations.

It is not unreasonable to expect, however, that U.S. commercial interests be given a reasonable opportunity to compete in the Korean marketplace. Unfortunately, for many American products and commodities, this is not the case. Few of our allies have erected as extensive and unfair a system of trade barriers as has Korea.

Let me share with you a few examples, Mr. President. It is illegal—I repeat illegal—for Korean nationals to even possess foreign cigarettes. Koreans found guilty of possessing foreign cigarettes are subject to fines, imprisonment, and possible loss of employment. This is not a symbolic policy, Mr. President. The Koreans are serious about this issue—so serious, that in 1983, over 5,000 Korean were found guilty of possessing foreign cigarettes. This policy is ridiculous and unfair. The Koreans will not even purchase leaf tobacco from Kentucky farmers for use in their own cigarette blends. Perhaps it is best put into perspective when on realizes that it is legal for Koreans to possess firearms, yet it is illegal for a Korean national to possess an American cigarette.

Let me give another example of the unfair trading policies practiced by Korea. This one involves citrus products. Korea has a developing tangerine industry, although the tangerines are of very poor quality. To upgrade the flavor and quality of the finished juice product, imported orange juice concentrate is added. The catch here, though, is that 70 percent of the finished product must be Korean juice which effectively prevents the volume of American citrus products from substantially increasing. To further compound the problem, imports of orange juice concentrate are burdened with a 50 percent ad valorem tax. I suppose it could be worse, Mr. President, had the Koreans not gone to "great lengths" to liberalize their trade policy by reducing the ad valorem tax from 60 percent to a mere 50 percent.

Still another agricultural commodity which faces a significantly unfair trade environment is beef. All beef imports to Korea were unilaterally discontinued in 1984, except for small quantities of high-quality American beef which were imported for use in Korean resort hotels. In May 1985, all importation of beef was discontinued. The importation of beef was not discontinued because Koreans stopped eating red meat—the per capita consumption rate is over 8 pounds annually—but because of pressure from Korean cattlemen to restrict imports. I can understand why the cattlemen would want to do that, since Korean beef costs consumers over $17 per pound. surely American beef cattle farmers would love an opportunity to participate in that market, but are prevented from doing so for purely protectionist reasons. With domestic meat prices at $17 per pound, I cannot believe that there is a glut of beef on the market.

An equally troubling Korean trade policy exists regarding the importation of computers and computer software. At present, Mr. President, the Koreans have imposed a total ban on micro- and mini-computers, including software and peripherals. Industry analysts estimate that there is a potential market of $50 to $80 million which is completely unavailable to American computer companies. As the Republic of Korea continues its rapid business growth, there is every reason to believe that the computer market will continue to be very lucrative. There is no good reason, Mr. President, why we should not be permitted to compete in this market.

Ironically, in light of these restrictions, we have extended to Korea over the last decade billions of dollars worth of duty-free access to our markets under the Generalized System of Preferences. I am convinced, therefore, that as long as Korea persists in maintaining selective policies and practices which unreasonably restrict U.S. commerce, it is inconsistent for the United States to extend this preferential tariff treatment to Korea—an advantage, I might add, worth over $1.5 billion annually in duty-free access to our markets. Or to put it another way, an amount equal to roughly half of our trade deficit with Korea.

Mr. President, our friendship with Korea demands the maintenance of a certain level of accountability. Since the 1950's, the United States and Korea have enjoyed an alliance built on mutual trust and respect. To continue to ignore the inequities in our trade relationship is to weaken our overall friendship during a time when we should be looking for ways to strengthen our alliance. For Korea to support those policies, which our farmers and businessmen can only conclude are unfair and discriminatory, is for Korea to choose their limited self-interest over the common interest.

In response to this situation, I am today introducing legislation to express the sense of the Senate that until substantial progress is made in the liberalization of Korean import restrictions, the Republic of Korea should be removed—I repeat, removed—as a beneficiary country under the U.S. Generalized System of Preferences.

The next weeks and months are critical in terms of decisions being made about trade policy between our two nations. As the host of the 1988 Summer Olympic Games, Korea will have the opportunity to show the world that it is a progressive and dynamic growth-oriented country. I invite and encourage my colleagues to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by my resolution to support our Korean ally as they move toward this goal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a table outlining the major bilateral trade issues with the Republic of Korea.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLIC OF KOREA—BILATERAL TRADE ISSUES

Issue	Background	Status
Cigarettes	Korea bans importing cigarettes for use by Korean nationals. All cigarette sales are handled by the Office of Monopoly.	Bilateral discussions continue in an effort to liberalize this practice.
Computers	The Ministery of Trade and Industry Computer Decree was revised in August 1983 making it virtually impossible to export small computers and peripherals to Korea in the absence of a plan for local production of some equipment.	Bilateral discussions continue in an attempt to modify the decree.
Frozen Potato Imports	Korea recently placed frozen potatoes under prior licensing approval procedures, thus inhibiting U.S. exports to fast food outlets and undermining their automatic approval status.	The U.S. embassy in Korea has been asked to make representations to appropriate Korean officials to return to automatic licensing status.
Intellectual Property	The United States is concerned about weak patent protection for chemicals and pharmaceuticals, the absence of copyright protection for foreigners, the absence of explicit copyright protection for computer software and difficulties in meeting trademark "use" requirements for goods subject to import restrictions.	Technical discussions on copyright matters were held in November 1984. Similar discussions on patents and trademarks are planned for mid-1985. A Section 301 proceeding was initiated on September 23, 1985.
Licensing and Tariff Liberalization for Higher Valued Products; Market Maintenance for Primary Products.	Consultations over the past two years have yielded some positive results. The most recent meeting, on July 1–2, 1985 resulted in liberalizing almonds, grapefruit, cherries, cottonseed oil and canned corn. The meeting also resulted in a confirmation that Korea is not considering new variable import taxes on primary products. Efforts toward total liberalization, however, fell short of what is needed to counter the protectionist sentiment toward Korean imports.	A six-month market access campaign is currently under interagency review.
Market Access	In December 1983 Korea liberalized import licensing restrictions on 31 items of interest to U.S. manufacturers and farm interests. Service firms in the United States continue to identify import licensing restrictions, high tariffs and restrictions on services as major impediments to greater U.S. exports to Korea.	The U.S.-Korean Trade Group addressed these matters in February 1984 and July 1985. Bilateral consultations continue on specific liberalization requests for both merchandise and services.
Steel	In December 1984 Korea agreed to limit its exports of steel to the United States to 1.9 pecent of U.S. apparent consumption until September 30, 1989.	Details for implementing the agreement were negotiated between January and May 1985.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

METROPOLITAN WASHINGTON AREA AIRPORT TRANSFER

PRESSLER AMENDMENT NO. 1700

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. PRESSLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1017) to provide for the transfer of the Metropolitan Washington Airports to an independent airport authority; as follows:

Line 7, page 10, strike the word "Five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Three".

Line 10, page 10, strike the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three".

Line 11, page 10, strike the words "one member" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two members".

Lines 6 and 7, page 11, strike "in the case the Commonwealth of Virginia and the District of Columbia,".

Lines 8 through 10, strike "The Governor of Virginia shall make the final two Virginia initial appointments for one two-year and one four-year term."

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is very simple. It is intended to more evenly distribute the membership of the Authority's governing body. As presently drafted, this bill reserves five slots for Virginia, three for the District of Columbia, two for Maryland, and one for the President with Senate advice and consent. My amendment would change this makeup to allow three slots for Virginia, District of Columbia, and Maryland, respectively; and two for the President with Senate advice and consent.

It is clear that the deck is currently stacked against Maryland. We could just as well not allow Maryland any members if we go forward with the bill as presently designed.

I opposed this bill in the Commerce Committee. Not only is it unfair to Maryland, but the rest of the country as well. There is good reason to treat these airports differently. They are truly national airports, serving a city that was established for the entire Nation—not any single State.

In the wake of airline deregulation, it is already difficult enough for citizens from States such as South Dakota to have adequate access to our Nation's capital. I am concerned that the more control of these airports we put into the hands of any one State, the interests of the other States will be lost in the shuffle.

Presently, we all have at least an indirect voice in the operation and control of this airport. It is important that we maintain some control so the interests of the other States are not forgotten—or at a minimum, we should at least ensure against giving any one State what is tantamount to almost exclusive control over important decisions that affect all of our constituents. Everyone has a right to access to this city. Important decisions in this regard should not be dominated by a single State.

PRESSLER AMENDMENT NO. 1701

Mr. PRESSLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1017), supra; as follows:

On page 32, insert the following immediately after line 2:

(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary shall not enter into any agreement which provides for the transfer of authority over the Metropolitan Washington Airports to the Airports Authority unless such agreement includes a requirement for the payment by such Airports Authority of not less than $1.5 billion.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to make certain that the U.S. Government gets a fair purchase price for these valuable assets. The estimated worth of these facilities is somewhere between $1.5 and $2 billion. But here we are, ready to give it away for $47 million! It never ceases to amaze me that in our efforts to commercialize or privatize functions of this sort, the Federal Government always wants to give them away rather than seek an adequate purchase price.

We just completed action on a bill to sell Conrail to the Norfolk Southern Corp., only to find out later that the CBO estimates that it will cost us $250 million to give it away! Now we want to do the same thing with these airports. By the time we sell these assets at the fire sale price of $47 million, then turn around and allow the improvements to be financed through federally subsidized bonds, it will cost us hundreds of billions to give these airports away.

If we are going to privatize, we should at least demand a reasonable fair market price.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this amendment be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

PRESSLER AMENDMENT NO. 1702

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. PRESSLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1017), supra; as follows:

On page 32, insert the following immediately after line 16:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Airports Authority shall not utilize any bond guaranteed by the Federal Government for the purpose of undertaking or completing the improvement, construction, and rehabilitation of facilities, as provided in this section."

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to make certain that the Federal Treasury is not raided further after this legislation is enacted. I do not know whether all Senators are aware of it, but under the proposal before us today, we will be forced to continue to pay for this giveaway for many years to come.

What will happen is this: After we sell these valuable assets for little or nothing, the local authorities plan to finance many hundreds of millions of dollars in capital expenditure through the use of federally subsidized bonds. If the purpose of this legislation is to help balance the budget, this is a strange way to go about it. Because of the gross inefficiencies of the subsidized bond process, it will ultimately cost us more than if we were to finance these expenditures directly out of the trust fund as the able Senator from South Carolina has proposed.

Again, Mr. President, this points out the tortured logic behind this proposal, and is in itself a strong argument for defeating this bill.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

ON PENTAGON REFORM

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Senate Armed Services Committee recently reported a bill on the Reorganization of the Department of Defense out of committee. That bill is the result of approximately 3 years of effort by the Senate Armed Services Committee staff and the project was initiated by Senator JOHN TOWER and the late Senator, Scoop Jackson.

During the course of the deliberations concerning this bill, it became apparent that this was, at the very least, a controversial issue. I have maintained for some time that the Department of Defense, in spite of the fact that it does many things well, is in need of some reforms.

A recent article by Herbert Stein, which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on March 14, 1986 concerning Pentagon reform, very solidly supports my contentions that some changes need to be made. I highly recommend this article by Mr. Stein to all my colleagues who are interested in this subject, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ON PENTAGON REFORM

(By Herbert Stein)

I have always been skeptical of complaints about management of the defense program. Often they seemed to be rationalizations for cuts in defense expenditures that were really wanted on other grounds. Also, I had seen lots of high-powered secretaries of defense, and many expert commissions on defense management, come and go. I thought what mortals could do they had done and what waste remained we would have to live with.

I have now had an unusual educational experience. I have been serving as a member of the President's Blue Ribbon Commission on Defense Management, chaired by David Packard. I have had discussions with many secretaries of defense, past and present, other high-ranking civilians in the DoD, numerous four-star officers, defense contractors, defense reformers, whistle blowers, students of defense and members of Congress. I have had the opportunity to chew the subject over with other members of the commission, which includes four former high civilian defense officials, four former high military officers, two former cabinet members, three businessmen, a senator and a congressman.

This has not made me a defense expert. But it has led me to some conclusions and, most unusual at my age, it has caused me to change my mind on some points.

Basically, I have concluded that some important things are wrong and should be fixed. It isn't useful to repeat Bert Lance's Law: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." The defense program isn't broke but it is defective, and it can and should be fixed.

Nothing I have learned indicates that the defense budget should be cut. Steps can be taken that would get more military strength per dollar of expenditure. But these steps still have to be taken. Even after they have been taken, their full effect on costs will not be seen for several years. Most important, applying these savings, when realized, to cutting the budget will be justified only if the amount of military strength we are now getting is adequate. It may be that the savings should be applied to achieving a higher level of strength, not a lower level of expenditure. That issue our commission did not study.

As I see it, there are five major defects in defense management:

1. Decisions about the size of the defense program and its main elements are not realistically adapted to national-security goals and plans, on the one hand, and to the capacity of the economy on the other hand. The most conspicuous evidence of this is the major shifts from a low level of defense spending in the late 1970s to the rapid buildup initiated in 1981 to the abrupt slowdown of the program now under way—while the national-security threat and our capacity were basically unchanged.

The low budgets of the late 1970s resulted from wishful thinking about the threat. The Reagan buildup reflected a more accurate estimation of the threat, but it did not prepare the country to pay for the buildup, either by taxes or by borrowing. The cuts already made in the Reagan program, and the further cuts threatened, are caused by arbitrary limitations on acceptable amounts of taxing or borrowing.

Responsibility for these serious deficiencies begins at the White House. The president, with the assistance of the National Security Council, does not formulate a national-security policy precise enough for defense options to be deducted from it. He does not get military options presented to him in terms that permit him to judge how well they meet his national-security objectives. He does not get budget options presented in terms that permit him to judge how much more or less security is provided by more or less expenditure. Too often, military requirements or budget limits are accepted as absolutes, dominating all other considerations, rather than as factors to be weighed against each other.

The difficulties are compounded when the decisions move to Congress. Decision making about defense is now divided among dozens of congressional committees and subcommittees, so that hardly anyone feels a primary responsibility for the defense program as the safeguard of our national security. Too many are able to look upon the defense budget as a big pot of money from which they can serve their special interests.

2. The defense program is highly unstable. The big swings from the Carter program to the first term Reagan program to what looks like the second term Reagan program have already been noted. Since the program is not firmly rooted in national-security requirements and economic capabilities. It is also subject to frequent and unpredictable swings between years and even within the year. These swings originate both in the administration and in Congress, as defense becomes just another counter in the game of budget management and budget politics. Defense officials and contractors are also encouraged to play this game. Since future budget limits are uncertain, they have an incentive to get projects initiated even though funds to complete them are not in sight, hoping thereby to establish commitments that will force the money to be provided later. If this hope is disappointed, there are costly stretchouts or cancellations.

Unnecessary instability of all kinds is the greatest source of excess cost in the defense program. A reasonably stable and predictable path of expenditures in the past 10 years would have yielded the level of forces actually achieved at a cost tens and possibly hundreds of billions of dollars below what we have actually spent.

3. Present organization, forces and plans are not well adapted to the limited violence crises that are experienced today. The Marine intervention in Lebanon and the invasion of Grenada are examples. Our military estalishment is designed to prepare in peace for a war in which all forces are engaged and the nation is on a war footing. They have not been well prepared for the other circumstances in which the armed forces may be needed. These are likely to be circumstances in which speed, secrecy and flexibility are essential, in which the forces engaged are small but include elements from more then one service and more than one theater, in which there may be unusual limitations on the way force is used and in which continuous integration of political and military decisions is imperative. A major obstacle to effective operation in such circumstance is an excessively long chain of command between the political military decision makers in Washington and the forces involved in the field. For example, when the Marine garrison was in Lebanon, command over them ran from Washington to Brussels to Stuttgart to London to Naples to the Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean to the Marine component of that fleet and then to the Marines ashore. Such a chain offers too many opportunities for information and instructions to be delayed, lost or misunderstood.

4. Probably the most serious deficiency in the defense acquisition process is the failure to assign clear responsibility and authority once a decision has been made to enter production. Nominally at this point a program manager takes charge. But in fact his authority is severely limited. He must contend with a large number of people who are in a position to make distracting demands upon him. These include representatives of the services who want to change the system in one way or another and representatives of various anciliary functions, such as aid to small businesses, environmental concerns, competitiveness concerns, etc. The program manager must also report on his progress through many layers of higher authority and seek approval from all of those layers for decisions he wants to make.

This is the opposite of the best private practices and the few outstanding Department of Defense programs. There the basic principle is to give someone the authority to do his assigned task and to hold him accountable to a high-level official who is the only person entitled to change his assignment. In Department of Defense common practice, the primary objective of getting the job done quickly and efficiently is subordinated to a passion for participation by representatives of secondary interests within the Pentagon, such as small business, equal opportunity or envirnmental advocacy.

The Department of Defense commonly insists that its weapons systems be produced with parts made to order to military specifications rather than permitting production to commercial specifications or purchase of parts available in the commercial market. In a great many cases the commercial specifications or parts of equivalent performance are much cheaper than the military specifications. In some cases the commercial specifications are of superior quality because market-competition forces private producers to incorporate the latest technological advances, whereas military specifications change only slowly. The insistence on military specifications is an example of bureaucratic aversion to taking the risks involved in a decision to depart from an established routine.

Other defects, although possibly less clearly established than these, are also important. These include inadequate balance among the views and responsibilities of the service chiefs, the chiefs of the Unified Commands for the various global regions and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, weakness of the military transportation system, premature decisions on adoption of weapons, "gold-plating" of requirements, inability to attract and hold highly qualified people in defense acquisition, and ineffective and excessively bureaucratic methods of dealing with problems of fraud and abuse.

This is an impressive list of things wrong with the management of our national defenses. But it is also a list of things that can be corrected, if not perfectly at least substantially. It is an agenda for the future, not an indictment of the past.●

ACID RAIN

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, President Reagan has recently received and reviewed a critical document: "The Joint Report of the Special Envoys on Acid Rain."

Acid rain is by no means a new problem. It has long threatened our precious environment. It has been poisoning our lakes, streams, and forests for decades. It has already disrupted that delicate balance of the ecosystem, perhaps irreversibly.

Some of us have been pushing for action against acid rain's devastating effects for years. However, it is only now, with the release of the special envoys' report, that this administration is giving acid rain the attention it deserves.

This moment is long overdue, Mr. President. As the second "Shamrock Summit" between Prime Minister Mulroney and President Reagan gets underway, let us not allow the moment to consist only of optimistic rhetoric. Let us ensure that 1986 will be remembered as the year that the United States and Canada cooperated to overcome the problem of acid rain. The time for talk is over; the time for action is now.

Yesterday I introduced a sense of the Senate resolution to this effect, Mr. President. The resolution urges the President to endorse the findings of the special envoys' report, which includes analyses of the sources, extent, transport patterns, and damaging effects of acid deposition. The envoys' findings come as no surprise to those of us who have been concerned about this problem all along; however, these frightening but indisputable conclusions should force the administration to recognize, for the first time, that acid rain is a serious threat—to the United States, to Canada, and to all future generations of the world.

My resolution goes one step further. It supports the recommendation of the special envoys' report for renewed research into methods for addressing the problem, but also calls for immediate action. I urge my colleagues in the House and the Senate to enact comprehensive legislation to mandate reductions in acid-rain causing emissions through fixed emission reduction targets and timetables.

I readily agree that further research—to develop new technologies for reduction of emissions and to improve existing technologies—is desirable and even necessary. But sufficient and effective technology exists now. We have the means to begin making in-roads against this devastating process. Why not get started—before it is too late?●

INNA AND NAUM MEIMAN: A SOVIET COUPLE'S SAD SITUATION

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, more and more information is coming to light which exposes the worsening medical condition of Inna Meiman, a Soviet refusenik who has cancer. Inna and her husband, Naum, are personal friends of mine and I am deeply saddened by the continued Soviet refusal to allow the Meimans permission to emigrate. Inna can be medically treated, but not by Soviet doctors who have said there is nothing more thay can do. Medical authorities in the West have invited to treat Inna, free of charge.

I strongly urge the Soviet authorities to allow Inna and Naum Meiman to emigrate.

One of the most recent articles that I have seen which details the Meiman's plight appeared in the March 9, 1986, edition of Toronto's the Sunday Sun, by Genya Intrator. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

COUPLE IN DESPERATE STRAITS

(By Genya Intrator)

American university student Lisa Paul was so moved by the desperate situation of Jewish "refusenik" Inna Meiman that she went on a 25-day hunger strike to urge Soviet authorities to grant her an exist visa.

Paul, 23, a Russian studies major at the University of Minnesota, has just returned from a two-year stay in Moscow where Meiman served as her Russian language tutor.

Meiman, 54, is an English professor who has written several college textbooks, including Modern English for Advanced Learners. She is the wife of Prof. Naum Meiman, 74, an authority on mathematics and elementary particles.

The couple has been refused permission to emigrate on the pretext Meiman possesses "secrets", despite testimony of coworkers the results of his work were published in scientific journals.

in 1982, Inna was diagnosed as having soft tissue sarcoma, a severely debilitating cancer. She has undergone four operations on her neck and was told by local doctors that they could do no more.

She has been invited to undergo treatment in the U.S. Israel, France and Sweden, but Soviet authorities have refused her permission to leave the country.

In an open letter to Communist Party chairman Mikhail Gorbachev, Meiman said he could not "remain helplessly silent while heartless anonymous officials doom my wife to a tortuous death.

He said he's been seeking permission to go to Israel to rejoin his daughter since 1975, but has been refused because of his work.

He last worked on classified material more than 30 years ago when he did mathematical computations for the institute of physical problems of the Academy of Sciences.

Meiman pleads with Gorbachev for an act of mercy to let his wife go to the West for medical treatment that could save her life.

The inter-religious Task Force urges readers to support the campaign for Inna Meiman. Write get-well messages to her; send them to USSR/RSFSR/Moscow 113127/Naberezhnaya Gorkogo 4/22 Apt. 57, Inna Meiman.

Write to Lisa Paul, 40 27th Ave., SE, Minneapolis, Minn 55414.

Send telegrams and letters to the following Soviet officials demanding that Meiman be permitted to emigrate:

USSR/RSFSR/Moscow 3 Rakhmanovsky Pereulok/ Sergei P. Kurenkov, minister of health, and

USSR/Moscow 103009/ 6 Ogareva Street/ Rudolf Kuznetsov, head of the national OVIR.

NEIGHBORHOOD CLEANERS ASSOCIATION

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to commend the efforts of the Neighborhood Cleaners Association [NCA], which is headquartered in New York and represents members from the States of New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Florida, Connecticut, and Delaware. Historically, the month of April has been designated by the fabric care industry as "Good Grooming Month." The NCA is continuing the campaign it began during "Good Grooming Month" last year—"The People's Campaign" to help groom an American symbol, the Statue of Liberty. I am pleased to note that the NCA Program has been a great success.

This year marks the 40th anniversary of NCA, and I want to extend my best wishes on this occasion. NCA started in New York City in 1946 with fewer than a hundred members. Its program meant survival for small retail dry cleaners who were involved in zoning fights. From that small beginning of assisting a small number of members to establish property rights in the zoning issue for the retail dry cleaner, NCA has grown to 3,800 members in nine States and has distinguished itself on behalf of its members.

NCA was one of the first small-quantity generators to establish a pickup for hazardous waste—even before being required to do so by law in 1984. It instituted a program for its members to have their chemical wastes picked up and disposed of in an approved site, thereby protecting our environment. NCA has distinguished itself in many areas over the last 40 years.

When retail dry cleaning came into being after World War II, there was no established training program on the proper care and cleaning of clothing. The NCA started the New York School of Dry Cleaning in 1949 to meet this need. This school was formally recognized and licensed by the State of New York and has trained thousands since then. NCA has also trained, through a working relationship with vocational rehabilitation agencies, thousands of the hardcore unemployed. The New York school offers courses throughout the country and has trained an estimated 150,000 persons.

Over the last 40 years, NCA has worked to assist its members in training, has directed each member toward a responsible approach to meeting the needs of a safe environment, and has participated in every aspect of public community service, from collecting clothing for Goodwill to providing toys, games, and candy to hospitals every year.

Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to advise my colleagues of "Good Grooming Month" and to congratulate the Neighborhood Cleaners Association on their 40th anniversary.●

THE IMPORTANCE OF TRADE WITH CANADA

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, a trade initiative of historic consequence has been launched between the United States and Canada, one which hopefully will refute those who think the chief answer to economic problems is to close the door and hide in the dark.

The United States and Canada—which already benefit from the largest two-day trade in history, trade that totalled $118 billion in 1984—are discussing the possibility of reducing and eliminating trade barriers that still exist between them.

This is no easy task, and it will not be a painless one. But it is a critical undertaking, and President Reagan and Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney deserve our encouragement and support for setting this shining example.

There are some who would imperil this magnificant opportunity with demands that certain United States-Canadian disputes be resolved before even allowing these negotiations to begin. Whenever right may lie in these individual disputes, they should not stand in the way of the immense opportunity to negotiate a bilateral trade agreement that would benefit all.

With the hope of promoting the atmosphere of good faith essential to the success of these negotiations, I would like to submit for the RECORD remarks delivered February 25 by the Ambassador of Canada, Allan E. Goltlieb, before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce on the prospects for a United States-Canadian trade agreement.

THE PROSPECTS FOR A CANADA/U.S.A. TRADE AGREEMENT

(Allen E. Gotlieb)

Good Morning: Today I would like to discuss with you the prospects for a new trade agreement between Canada and the United States. In Canada this topic has and will continue to dominate public debate on economic issues for the coming year. I expect that as the time for formal negotiations approaches it will also become a topic of much debate in the USA.

The decision to propose the negotiation of a new trade agreement to the United States was announced by the Prime Minister to the House of Commons on September 26 last year. This decision flowed naturally from Prime Minister Mulroney's new Conservative Government which had campaigned on the need to "refurbish relations with the United States" and to get the economy moving again by setting it free from excessive government controls and regulation.

The new government came to office with a profound belief in the importance of individual enterprise and great confidence in the capacity of the Canadian economy to compete in a more international trading and investment environment.

The Government therefore set about replacing the more interventionist policies of its predecessors in the areas of energy and investment policy and developing a more activist approach to dismantling trade barriers. Underlying these decisions was the basic premise that the government should encourage the liberalized flow of goods, services and capital as this could benefit the Canadian economy.

In little more than a year after taking office in September 1984, the Mulroney government replaced the much vilified "National Energy Policy" that was adopted in 1980, with a market-oriented policy for oil and natural gas that does not discriminate on the basis of ownership or nationality of the investor. As a result of these changes I believe that the energy sector is now less regulated than that in the United States.

With respect to foreign investment, the new government decided to roll back legislation which, since the early '70s, required that foreign investors demonstrate that their investments were of significant benefit to the Canadian economy. That legislation also required that any takeover, regardless of size be reviewed.

The new Investment Canada Act of 1985 reversed the earlier policy by making the presumption that foreign investment is good for the Canadian economy. Equally significant, Investment Canada now has a mandate to promote foreign investment in Canada, thus redirecting its energies to attracting new investment.

Under the new Act new investments are not subject to any review. Takeovers of existing enterprises are reviewable only where the value of the acquisition exceeds a relatively high threshold. An exception to this general rule is made only for certain culturally sensitive sectors.

Since the Government announced the new investment policy, the level of non-Canadian investment in Canada has risen by 25 percent. We hope and believe that this is a trend that will grow as investors come to appreciate that Canada is once again "open for business".

After experiencing the first fall in economic activity in nearly thirty years in 1982, the Canadian economy has returned to a strong growth path. After achieving 5 percent real growth in 1984, real economic output grew by 4 percent during the first half of 1985, and by well over 6 percent during the second. This was twice the rate of growth of the United States in 1985.

Growth is expected to remain strong again in 1986. Inflation has been remarkably well behaved for the past two years and is remaining very moderate even with strong growth.

Since the coming to office of the new Government in September 1984, Canada has created 580,000 new jobs—which on a proportionate basis would translate into 5.3 million new jobs here—a remarkable record. Unemployment remains unacceptably high but has gone down from 11.2 percent in January '85 to 9.8 percent in January 1986.

Shortly after taking office, and in keeping with its mandate "to get the economy moving again", the Mulroney Government began a complete review of trade policy with a view to finding new ways to "secure and enhance Canadian access to export markets".

Given the concentration of our exports to the United States and the fragility of our access to that major market, some means had to be found to enlarge and improve on that access and to make it more secure and predictable.

Following his announcement to the House of Commons, on September 26, Prime Minister Mulroney wrote to President Reagan on October 1, 1985 to "propose that our two governments pursue a new trade agreement involving the broadest package or mutually beneficial reductions in barriers to trade in goods and services".

President Reagan warmly welcomed the Canadian iniative on October 2, and following extensive consultations between the Administration and Congressional leaders, the President, on December 10, 1985 sent forward the formal notice of intent to negotiate a trade agreement with Canada as required under U.S. trade law. Congress has 60 legislative days to react. About 24 days have now elapsed. We expect the negotiations to start early in May. Every indication we have is that the Congressional response will be positive.

Clearly an iniative of historic importance has been launched. I would like to share with you the reasons for the initiative and describe the objective Canada will be pursuing.

The rationale for Canada to participate in trade negotiations and conclude trade agreements is self evident. Canada is a trading nation. Much of our economic structure can be explained only in terms of our external trade. More than thirty percent of Canada's GNP is generated by our exports of goods and services. At the same time, Canada imports a wide variety of both producer and consumer goods which either cannot be produced in Canada or which can be obtained more cheaply from abroad.

As a first rank producer of commodities, as a manufacturing nation, and as a major force in world banking and consulting engineering, Canada's prosperity depends on its ability to sell goods and services in many parts of the world, especially in the United States, Western Europe and Japan.

For Canadian producers and investors, the test of our foreign trade policy lies in whether the government can maintain current access available to Canadian producers and improve market access for those sectors where Canadian production is or can be competitive in world markets.

Private sector investment is a key to growth and job creation. Canadian producers need to be confident that their market access is secure and that foreign governments will not move to frustrate the effort of Canadians to market their goods abroad.

Unlike our two principal trading partners, Japan and the United States, Canada does not possess a large internal market. Unlike European countries Canada does not have preferred access to a larger market through regional trading blocs.

These factors explain why Canada has been a very active participant in every round of multilateral trade negotiations over the last 40 years. We are and will remain leaders in the international efforts to press ahead with the new multilateral round scheduled to begin in September.

We have, moreover a binding international agreement with the United States covering all our trade—the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and this agreement conveys substantial rights and imposes heavy obligations upon both countries. We have one subsidiary but highly important trade agreement with the United States covering automobiles and several dealing with defence products. Hence the question before us is not whether there should be a trade agreement between Canada and the United States but rather whether we can go farther and do better than the present arrangements.

To place this issue in perspective two way trade totalled US $118.8 billion in 1984. Canada enjoyed a surplus on merchandize trade of US $15.4 billion. This surplus on merchandize account was second in importance only to Japan.

Our surplus, however, has not come under the same close scrutiny and criticism because the Canadian market is essentially open. Ample testimony to this is given by the fact that U.S. exports to Canada increased by over 20 percent in 1984. This should be contrasted with U.S. export performance in Japan and the EEC where the rates were 8 and 6 percent respectively.

Further the surplus we enjoy on the merchandize account is substantially offset by a large and traditional deficit we run with the United States on invisibles (i.e. interest, dividends, tourism and service payments). For 1984 the current account surplus was U.S. $6.7 billion. This was only the third year since World War II that Canada enjoyed an overall surplus on current account.

The other side of the coin, so to speak, is the importance of Canada as a market for American goods and services. Canada is by far the largest market for the United States, larger than Japan and equal to the market offered by the member countries of the European Community.

Canadian imports of U.S. goods in 1984 were US $46.5 billion. In the same year Japan imported US $23.6 billion and the European Community imported US $46.9 billion of U.S. goods. In 1984, Canada, a nation of 25 million purchased more than 21.3 percent of all U.S. exports. Moreover, 85 percent of these goods were fully or partially manufactured.

In 1985, U.S. exports to Canada increased by 12 percent. This increase in exports to Canada should be contrasted with a decline in exports to the European Community of 2 percent and a decline in exports to Japan of 4 percent. Again in 1985, the Canadian market absorbed 22.3 percent of all U.S. exports.

One of the most important things we want to do is to open up the vast U.S. market to Canadian industry in order to increase its efficiency and competitiveness. Through increased scale of production and greater specialization in certain products, Canadian manufacturers would have a unique opportunity to increase their competitiveness and efficiency, increase employment opportunities, and ultimately raise the real income of all Canadian workers.

New jobs are created and new investment is stimulated when the market is large enough to allow economies of scale and specialized production. Better jobs are created when companies are confident about the future and are prepared to invest to remain competitive.

Whatever we can achieve in opening up the U.S. market, our present access to this market is under considerable threat. Canadian jobs are lost and new jobs are not created when the United States imposes quotas or higher tariffs on trade. In many cases the threat of protectionist actions is as potent a deterrent to investment as is the actual imposition of a restrictive measure.

Examples which come readily to mind are the steel and softwood lumber issues. Let me take a few moments on lumber.

Softwood lumber exports to the U.S.A. are an important ingredient in our bilateral trade. In 1984 they were valued at $C 3.3 billion. They are also a valued import as they make up the shortfall in U.S. production and meet the real needs of many users who prefer the species, size and quality of softwood lumber available from Canada.

Lumber is not a new issue. The industry is prone to cycles of boom and bust. When the market is stong, Canadian softwood lumber is welcome. When the market turns down, the U.S. industry would like us to go away lest the abundant supplies create a downward pressure on prices.

In the current cycle the U.S. industry has alleged that Canadian forest management and pricing practices are unfair. It has requested that steps be taken to either limit volume or raise prices of imported lumber.

The Canadian industry has been the subject of the most intense scrutiny for the past five years. Two investigations by the ITC under Section 332 and a massive countervailing duty case have failed to provide evidence that would substantiate the U.S. lumber industry's claims. Yet the pressure for limiting our access to your market for lumber continues to grow.

Today there are a number of bills before Congress that would either raise Canadian lumber prices, limit the volume or change the countervailing duty laws to make current Canadian practices actionable.

Recognizing the seriousness of the problem, we have agreed to enter into high level, government to government talks in an effort to try and resolve the issue. These talks should be allowed to proceed without prejudice.

The new protectionist threats come on top of an existing system of so-called contingency protection measures that pose an ever-present threat to many Canadian exports. Many Canadian companies doing business in the United States find themselves compelled to hire expensive Washington law firms as their U.S. competitors increasingly use the full array of U.S. trade remedy law in an effort to obtain relief from foreign competition.

Through a new agreement, we want to ward-off the very real threat to existing Canadian exports and Canadian jobs posed by the sweeping new protectionist measures being put forward in Congress. We want to seek to obtain an agreement with the United States that will help shield us against the continuing threat posed by existing protectionist measures in place in the United States, which have the effect of impeding exports and discouraging new investment in Canada aimed at supplying the U.S. market.

The third major objective for Canada in these negotiations will be to enshrine the improved access to the U.S. market in a treaty or congressional-executive agreement. Such treaty or agreement should include a strong dispute settlement mechanism to reduce the disparities in size and power and to provide fair, expeditious and conclusive solutions to differences of view and practices. It should also provide institutional and other provisions maintaining Canadian independence of action in areas of national endeavour.

While it may be clear why Canada has initiated this process it may not be equally apparent why the United States should want to pursue a bilateral trade agreement with Canada.

In my opinion there are a number of compelling reasons.

First as I mentioned earlier, Canada offers the largest, fastest growing and in many respects the easiest market for U.S. goods and services. In 1985, we took 22.3 percent of all U.S. goods exports and ran a sizeable deficit with you on services.

That was under the existing tariff structure. The average tariff facing goods flowing north is between 9 and 10 percent whereas the average level of U.S. tariffs is between 3-4 percent. It is therefore obvious that your trade could be considerably enhanced by moving to a zero tariff across the board.

Second, a large and growing proportion of the U.S. economic activity lies in the service sector. Given the proximity of our markets and the similarity of our economic systems we already have a flourishing two-way trade in services. Traditionally, you have enjoyed a large surplus in this account. In 1984, the surplus was $14 billion.

Improved and more predictable access into the service sector would obviously open new markets for U.S. firms. Looking beyond our bilateral horizon, there is an urgent need to begin developing international rules governing trade in services along the lines of those GATT rules that have served us well in the goods trade.

An agreement with Canada on services providing a broad legal framework and effective disciplines could serve as an example of what can be achieved in this new area. It could go a long way towards advancing our mutual interest in negotiating better international rules in the next MTN round.

Third, under the heading "improvements to trade in services" one could also envisage addressing a variety of regulatory issues that because of a lack of symmetry lead to the creation of trade barriers. Here one might think of such arcane subjects as grading standards for potatoes or plywood, approval processes, business travel, etc. In a relationship as complex as ours, there are hundreds of such issues that impede trade, often inadvertently.

Fourth, there are a number of non-tariff barriers at both the federal and provincial levels which impede U.S. access to certain parts of the Canadian market. In the United States you have such things as "Buy America" preferences or restrictions, small business set asides, State and local government preferences, etc. In Canada we have engaged in similar practices that have restricted U.S. access to certain areas of government purchasing or at the provincial level have made it more difficult for U.S. suppliers to compete such as in the area of alcoholic beverage marketing.

Finally there is the area of foreign investment. As I pointed out earlier the Mulroney government has made some very fundamental changes in this area, greatly reducing the regulatory scope of Investment Canada and increasing the transparency and predictability of the process. I understand that some U.S. interests would like further movement in this area towards completely unfettered access—a condition I might add that does not exist in the United States.

While this is a sensitive area, the government is on record as saying that it wants the broadest possible deal consistent with a balanced negotiation.

There is a lot of optimism on both sides of the border about a new trade deal. There are also some serious worries, especially in Canada. Some Canadians are extremely concerned about the effect these negotiations might have on Canadian cultural industries and, therefore, on our ability to express our national ethos and to protect our essential sovereignty.

No country is more open than Canada to foreign cultural products. Anyone who doubts that should look at our bookstores, our theatres, our broadcasting system, our galleries and museums. Equally no country in the world is more committed than Canada to making the rules of international commerce more transparent and fair.

Because we are so open, and because we live next door to the most powerful country in history with perhaps the most vibrant culture on earth, it is not surprising that preservation of our own cultural sovereignty has to be a preoccupation of the Canadian government.

But the commitment to preserving cultural sovereignty does not stop us from seeking better trade rules for cultural industries. From Canada's point of view, better rules are both possible and desirable.

We are prepared to discuss with the U.S. whatever concern you may have. We expect a similar openness of your side. No doubt, as the negotiations proceed, your side will state that it cannot meet certain Canadian demands; no doubt, we will do the same. But there will be many issues on which we will be able to agree. This is the essence of negotiations.

These negotiations will not be the first time that Canada and the U.S.A. will be sitting down to try and improve their trading relationship. Seventy-five years ago. the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier concluded an agreement providing for reciprocity between Canada and the U.S.A. This agreement has the crowning achievement of Laurier's liberal free-trade policy. It also sent the Laurier Government down to a crashing defeat, a lesson not lost on subsequent Canadian Governments.

But there is a happier lesson to be drawn from past history—the precedent setting agreements Canada and the U.S.A. negotiated in 1935 and 1938. These agreements established the "most-favoured-nation" principle and began the dismantling of extensive trade barriers that had been thrown up in the wake of the Smoot-Hawley tariff. Coming as they did in the depth of the depression they were a true act of faith in the benefits to be derived from a more open trading system. The principles of these bilateral accords formed the foundation of the post-war multilateral trading system.

The words Smoot-Hawley are often heard these days around Washington on the lips of people who fear that protectionist pressure may be driving the U.S. towards an historic error.

What is needed to avoid such an error, on your side of the border and on ours is an act of courage in our capacity to compete and an act of faith in the benefits of open markets, just as we made in the thirties. We, Canada and the U.S.A., have shown this leadership before, in our common interest. Canada is on record as wishing to try to do so again.

The Canadian Government has taken the initiative. It will be brought to fruition only with broad based support in both our countries. It requires that people like you who see the major economic and political benefits that can flow from such an agreement to actively promote it. I invite you to join me in countering the influence of the nay sayers that are always attracted to great initiatives. I invite you to join me in promoting an enterprise that will be good for Canadians and Americans alike.●

HHS'S LIST OF "OUTLIER" HOSPITALS

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, 2 days ago, the Department of Health and Human Services released the results of a statistical study comparing the actual number of deaths of Medicare patients in hospitals with the number that would have been expected according to a statistical model developed by the Department. Included on the list are those hospitals whose actual experience differed from the predicted experience by a statistically significant amount—whether for better or worse. This will be very helpful in ensuring quality of care for Medicare beneficiaries. But, right now, I believe it is vitally important that we all understand just what this list is—and what it is not.

This list is certainly not a list of hospitals which have been found to have problems in terms of the quality of care they provide—the model used by the Department does not take into account a number of important factors which could explain a hospital's appearance on the list. For example, the model used does not consider the severity of illness of the patients seen in that hospital, or even whether or not the hospital is a hospice or teaching hospital or referral hospital which can expect to see more severely ill cases. But, when peer review organizations—the groups charged with monitoring quality and utilization in the Medicare Program—receive the names of hospitals in their jurisdiction which appear on the list, they will know which hospitals' appearance is justified and which hospitals should be looked at more closely. The informaton is not very meaningful taken out of context—it is simply a tool, generated by HCFA on the basis of Medicare statistics, for the PRO's to use in monitoring the quality of care in hospitals, just as they were set up to do.

While I am pointing out what a crude and unrefined tool this list is in one respect, I should also point out that, in another way, it represents an important and valuable shift in the way in which the Government tries to measure or define quality of care. That is, it does not simply compare a patient's actual experience with a textbook recommendation as to what tests should have been ordered or what procedures should have been followed. Nor does it "measure" the quality of care provided by examining the physical plant or facilities to see if they meet some criteria from which inspectors will infer that they can deliver quality care. Those methods represent the old-fashioned thinking that we can ensure quality by requiring the process of delivering care to be set up in a way which should guarantee quality. Instead, we must begin to examine quality by going straight to the patients themselves—in other words, by focusing on the outcome, or the patients' condition following medical treatment, rather than the process of delivering that care. This outlier list is a valuable start toward approaching the health care system from the outcome side rather than the process or structure side.

I understand that the Department originally intended to send each PRO the names of the hospitals within its jurisdiction which appeared on the list so that the responsibility for investigating why these hospitals are outliers could be included in the contracts they are about to renegotiate with the Health Care Financing Administration. However, last week a copy of the list was leaked to the New York Times. When that happened, the Department decided to go public with it in order to explain the severe limitations to its usefulness so that no one would draw justified inferences from it and unduly frighten beneficiaries. I applaud their effort, and I hope they have been successful in allaying unfounded fears.

Admittedly, it would be very easy to draw broad conclusions based on this rough data; for instance, I cannot help being proud that only four Minnesota hospitals appeared on the list, that two of those had better experience—or lower death rates— than the model would have predicted, and that another has a hospice unit. But I want to caution everyone—especially beneficiaries—that this list is only a tool, a very preliminary step in reviewing the quality of care being provided to Medicare patients. We have been given a peek into the early stages of quality review. Let us not be unduly alarmed. It is just the system we set up doing its job.●

REINS ON INSURANCE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the liability insurance problem is a growing monster.

This Nation cannot ignore this problem, and we want to make sure we come up with answers that are solid for the customers, for the insurance companies, and for everyone.

But when people with no record of claims all of a sudden face increases as high as 63 percent, as in one case I read about, something is wrong.

The Economist newspapers in the Chicago area recently published an editorial, "Reins on Insurance."

It is an editorial that my colleagues and the insurance industry would do well to read, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

The movement for increased regulation of the insurance industry is gaining steam as the crisis continues unabated.

State Rep. Ellis Levin of Chicago has introduced a package of bills in the general assembly that would regulate insurance rates, require 90 rather than 30 days before an insurance policy can be canceled.

At a hearing Thursday before the House Task Force on Insurance, Levin charged that Illinois insurance rates are so high that insurance firms are making "obscene levels of profit."

Levin said rates here are "way out of line with other states," and contended that Illinois is the only state in the union lacking a mechanism to hold insurers accountable for their rates.

Property owners, local governments and small businesses are paying the price for the firms' profits, Levin said. While some insurance rates in Illinois have increased as much as 1,200 percent, rates in neighboring states like Indiana and Iowa are increasing by "only" 12, 15 or 25 percent, according to a study by the Legislative Research Unit of the General Assembly.

A spokesman for the Alliance of American Insurers disputed Levin's argument that rate controls are needed. He claimed conditions are no better in other states where government approval of rate hikes is required.

The spokesman, Bradley Kading, predicted that insurance premiums will be cut in Illinois by 1989, as part of the normal swing of prices in the free market.

But 1989 is three years away; at the rate premiums are increasing, small businesses and governments all over Illinois will be crushed by 1989. By then, rates could be astronomical.

Creation of a rate control commission require insurers to justify their rate increases. If observers like Levin are correct, a rate control commission would uncover any unjustified rate hikes.

At the same time, Sen. Paul Simon, D-Ill., has proposed national measures to fight the insurance crisis. He is talking about an end to antitrust laws that benefit insurance companies by limiting competition; plus a study of whether the federal government should get involved in providing some sorts of insurance.

Simon has also raised questions about tax law provisions that benefit insurance firms.

It appears that the longer insurers allow the crisis to continue, the louder the calls for increased regulation will become. It seems unlikely that insurers will be happy with the final product.●

ACTIVITIES OF THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR DEMOCRACY IN NICARAGUA

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, for some time, the National Endowment for Democracy has been providing financial support to those in Nicaragua who favor democracy. The Endowment's major grant has gone to La Prensa, Nicaragua's only independent daily newspaper, for the supplies it needs to publish. This grant has allowed La Prensa to continue to serve as the voice of the democratic opposition in Nicaragua.

The Endowment's assistance to La Prensa and its other activities on behalf of democracy in Nicaragua should not in any way be confused with President Reagan's request for aid to the Contras or any other official U.S. policy. The Endowment is an independent corporation. It supports only nonviolent activities aimed at promoting democracy around the globe.

Nicaragua is not the only country in which the Endowment has played an important role in aiding the forces of democracy. During the recent elections in the Philippines, the Endowment sponsored an international observer team to monitor election procedures. This team coordinated its efforts with the observer delegation I cochaired. Working with the Endowment team was a pleasure. It also helped insure that we got an accurate picture of election conditions throughout the Philippines.

Mr. President, I strongly support the Endowment's activities in Nicaragua, the Philippines, and elsewhere. Moreover, I believe all Americans, regardless of their views on aid to the Contras, can be proud of the Endowment's work in fostering democracy in Nicaragua. For the benefit of my colleagues, I ask that a description of the Endowment's program of support for La Prensa, approved at its January board meeting, be printed in the RECORD.

The description follows:

LA PRENSA

SUMMARY

La Prensa, Nicaragua's only independent daily, is seeking additional funds to purchase the supplies and other materials which are vital to its continued publication. A NED grant of $100,000 in FY 1985 for the purchase of these supplies was crucial to La Prensa's continued existence as a force for democracy in Nicaragua.

PROGRAM DESCRIPTION

Nicaragua's only independent daily newspaper, La Prensa, has requested another $100,000 to purchase essential printing supplies, spare parts for its presses, and wire and feature services. These supplies and services must be purchased abroad and paid for in dollars. La Prensa, however, cannot obtain the required dollars because of restrictions on foreign currency exchange imposed by the Sandinista government. These restrictions are due in part to Nicaragua's precarious financial status, but when applied selectively to La Prensa they also represent a form of economic harassment by the Sandinistas.

La Prensa estimates its foreign currency needs to purchase the necessary supplies and services as $10,000 per month. The required materials, vital to a major daily, include printing ink, photo supplies, chemicals and other printing supplies, and mechanical and electronic spare parts. The required services include the Associated Press, Agence France Press, Editors Press Service, New York Times wire service and King Features.

La Prensa received a $100,000 NED grant in FY 1985 for similar purposes which helped to meet its needs from February through November, 1985.

REASONS FOR ENDOWMENT SUPPORT

La Prensa is the only independent daily newspaper in Nicaragua. Although heavily censored, it continues to publish and has become a symbol of the embattled civic opposition to the Sandinistas.

The other two major dailies in Nicaragua do not share La Prensa's difficulties. Barricada, the Sandinista party newspaper, and El Nuevo Diario, which is pro-Sandinista, receive numerous donations and grants from abroad. Barricada, for example, received a complete rotary press from the East German Communist Party. Both Barricada and El Nuevo Diario receive preferential treatment from the Sandinista government in the allocation of foreign currency for their purchases abroad.

Although La Prensa is heavily censored and all reports which in any way are thought to be critical of the Sandinista government are deleted, it remains a vital force in Nicaraguan public life. It has a daily circulation of 70,000, and its eight to twelve-page edition includes two pages of sports and two pages of classified ads, in addition to local and foreign news.

NED's FY 1984 grant literally has kept La Prensa alive. For example, its editors have reported that the first shipment under the FY 1985 grant—a large supply of printers ink—arrived in Managua just as La Prensa's supply of ink had been depleted.

NED has had some success in enlisting other U.S. support for La Prensa. As a result of NED encouragement, Americares, a private foundation in New Canaan, Connecticut, has obtained commitments for 180 tons of newsprint (market value $94,500) from the U.S. pulp and paper industry, which will cover La Prensa's paper needs for four to five months. Shipments of the newsprint to Managua are already under way at a cost of approximately $22,000, also raised by Americares.

ORGANIZATION

Friends of the Democratic Center in Central America (Prodemca), a non-profit educational organization committed to the promotion of democracy and human rights in Central America, has agreed to administer the grant for a second year. Prodemca's National Council includes Angier Biddle Duke (Chairman), Maurice Ferre, J. Peter Grace, Theodore M. Hesburgh, Sidney Hook, Bayard Rustin, John R. Silber, William E. Simon, Ben J. Wattenberg, and Elie Wiesel.

A grant to La Prensa would be consistent with NED's objective of encouraging democratically-oriented journalistic enterprises in the Third World, in particular by assisting the media that serve as forums for free discussion and the advancement of democratic ideas. La Prensa has a long history as a crusading, independent newspaper. It opposed the Somoza regime, which resulted in the bombing of its offices and the murder of its chief editor. It originally supported the Sandinista government but withdrew its support when the Sandinistas reneged on their promise to create a pluralistic society with guarantees for press freedom.●

TUCSON JOURNALIST AWARDED THE ALFRED I. DU PONT-COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE IN BROADCAST JOURNALISM

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, on February 5, 1986, News Reporter Nancy Montoya of KGUN television, Tucson, AZ, was awarded the Alfred I. du Pont-Columbia University award. Receiving the award with Nancy was cameraman Tom Gilmer. Montoya, selected from over 1,000 entries, was honored for her distinction in broadcast journalism. The awards ceremony at Columbia University in New York City was telecast nationally on public broadcasting networks nationwide.

The Alfred I. du Pont-Columbia University award honors those who excel in radio, television, cable news, and public affairs programming. This prestigious award was established in 1942 by Jessie Ball du Pont in memory of her late husband. Montoya was recognized for localizing national news. For this, Montoya traveled to El Salvador and Nicaragua. Montoya's report, "Searching for Sanctuary," discussed the findings of the attorneys preparing for the Tucson Sanctuary trial. In her report on Nicaragua, "Politics of Peace", Montoya presented information on a group of American's who traveled to Nicaragua on a factfinding mission.

This award, one of the most esteemed in journalism, represents Nancy's commitment to individuals, issues, and the truth. Past recipients of this award include Roger Mudd, David Brinkley, and Terry Drinkwater. We are proud of Nancy and her dedication to her job and her community. Nancy has set a standard of excellence and we are pleased that she has been recognized for this by receiving such a prestigious award.●

RETIREMENT OF ELBREGE SULLIVAN

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues a tribute to Mr. Elbrege Sullivan, a native of Lawton, OK, who is retiring this year after 30 years as a leader for our dairymen. He has dedicated not only time and energy to this endeavor, but has also invested a keen interest and a comprehensive knowledge of the dairy industry to the development of many growing organizations.

Elbrege Sullivan will probably never stop working to help the dairy industry, but he is retiring this year from the Associated Milk Producers Inc. [AMPI] because of the mandatory age restriction at 65. He was active in organizing early dairy cooperatives in Oklahoma and has served as a committee chairman or member in every phase of dairy co-op work both locally and nationally. His leadership has spanned the National Milk Producers Federation, American Dairy Association, Oklahoma Dairymens Credit Union, and many other dairy organizations on local, State, and national levels.

A dinner was held in Elbrege Sullivan's honor in February by AMPI in Dallas. Many friends and associates were present to add their endorsements to the tribute being paid to him, and to praise him for "going the extra mile" for dairymen. He was known to sacrifice, not once, but many times and was remembered for giving the last full measure of devotion to dairy farmers. In response, the March issue of Dairymen's Digest quotes Mr. Sullivan as saying, "I had to pinch myself to realize you were talking about me. But let me tell you, everything has fallen into place for me * * * look at all the valuable contacts and wonderful friends I've made, yes right here in this room * * *."

The work will continue, and the leadership of AMPI will now pass on to others. But none will forget the dedication and pride that Elbrege Sullivan has for the dairy industry. Mr. President, I am proud to take this opportunity to thank Mr. Elbrege Sullivan for many years of service to this important sector of the agriculture industry, and I am pleased to share this tribute today with my colleagues.●

NEW JERSEY RADON TASK FORCE

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, in January I went to Sweden with a task force to investigate how that country has dealt with a problem of growing concern to residents of my State, and citizens throughout the country. The problem is radon gas contamination in homes.

This task force was comprised of members of the Federal Government, New Jersey State government, and private sector. I formed the group to bring together the types of people who will have to work cooperatively to address radon problems. Sweden has known of its indoor radon problems since the 1960's. Based on epidemiological studies, radon is estimated to cause as much as 40 percent of the lung cancers detected annually in Sweden. The information gathered in meetings with top Swedish environmental, health, and building officials is helpful as the United States begins to address radon contamination.

Mr. President, radon is a major public health threat in New Jersey. At least 250,000 homes in New Jersey alone are located atop a geologic formation known as the Reading Prong. The Reading Prong has higher than normal radon emissions, and 40 percent of New Jersey Reading Prong homes tested have high levels of radon gas. But radon contamination is by no means limited to the Reading Prong. New Jersey State environmental officials estimate that 1.6 million homes in the State could be at risk.

Mr. President, radon is more than a regional public health threat. Radon contamination has been found in 45 States. ABC News in Washington recently reported on the presence of radon in homes throughout the Washington metropolitan area, and I have received reports of radon contamination from States throughout the country. The Centers for Disease Control has reported that 6 million Americans are exposed to hazardous levels of radon, levels which could be causing 20,000 lung cancer deaths each year in this country. EPA will soon begin a national assessment of radon contamination. When this survey is completed, radon will further emerge as a national health problem.

Mr. President, radon is a national problem, and deserves national attention. The Senate has approved legislation to establish a radon program at the Environmental Protection Agency. As a sponsor of this bill, I have also worked to provide funding for EPA for a radon program to address the national scope of this problem adequately. EPA has made progress in setting up a program over the last year. But, the effort is just getting underway and will need continued support to effectively assess the problem nationally, develop mitigation techniques, and provide technical assistance and information to the States which are most affected by radon contamination.

Following my factfinding trip to Sweden, I prepared a report on the behalf of the task force. This report summarizes the findings of our visit, and recommends a course of action integrating Federal, State, and local governments and the private sector.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of this report be inserted in the record for the information of my colleagues.

The report follows:

RADON TASK FORCE REPORT

I. SWEDEN

A radon task force, led by U.S. Senator Frank R. Lautenberg, travelled to Stockholm, Sweden between January 7-10, 1986, to assess that country's response to indoor radon contamination, and how the Swedish experience could be of use to the U.S. The task force represented interests of New Jersey and the nation, public and private sectors. The participants served not only in their official capacities, but several as concerned homeowners residing within the Reading Prong area, also.

The members were: United States Senator Frank R. Lautenberg; New Jersey State Senator John H. Dorsey; Richard J. Guimond, director of the federal Environmental Protection Agency's radon programs; Marlene McMahon, New Jersey Builders Association; David Jackson, New Jersey Builders Association; Robert Ferguson, New Jersey Realtors Association; and John Spears, National Association of Homebuilders Research Foundation, Inc.

Over three days of meetings, the task force met with officials of the Board of Physical Planning and Building Research, Institute of Radiation Protection, Building Research Council, and the Institute of Environmental Medicine at the Karolinska Institute.

In addition, they met with municipal health officials, residents of a home which had been contaminated with high levels of radon, and a Swedish realtor.

The meetings encompassed all aspects of the radon problem—government policy, scientific research, economic effects, and the real effects of radon on homeowners.

The findings of the task force in Sweden were significant. Perhaps most important was the report given by Dr. Goran Pershagen of the Institute of Environmental Medicine. In describing a yet-to-be published report, Dr. Pershagen outlined epidemiological studies which show a definite link between lung cancer and residential radon contamination. Estimates link as much as 40% of lung cancers in Sweden with radon contamination.

Radon exposures in homes in Sweden are thought to have increased by a factor of three or four over the last 20-25 years. This correlates with the increasing attention to energy conservation in homes. Radon poses the greatest risk from radiation sources to Swedes, by a factor of about 14 over other sources, such as diagnostic x-rays.

Dr. Gunnar Bengtsson, Director-General of the Institute of Radiation Protection, said that as many as 140 deaths per million people each year could occur as a result as exposure to radon in homes. In Sweden, this would mean as many as 1100 deaths could be occurring due to radon each year. This was compared to exposure to x-ray diagnosis, which poses a fatal risk to ten per million, for a total projection of about 83 deaths each year.

In the U.S., all health estimates have, so far, been based on studies done on uranium miners. Although the evidence of increased lung cancers among miners due to radon exposure is clear, there has been some dispute over the effects of exposure at levels found in homes as opposed to mines.

While the task force was in Sweden, the Swedish government announced a major new policy initiative, firmly committing that nation to adequate treatment of the radon problem. The policy announcement placed the Institute of Radiation Protection (SSI) in the federal leadership role, to be responsible for overall strategy and to coordinate testing of homes. Other provisions of the announcement included: the determination of the feasibility of a nationwide epidemiological study; making municipalities financially responsible for finding homes with radon levels exceeding 400 Bequerels [1]

[1] A Bequerel (Bq) is the unit of measurement most commonly used for expressing radon concentration in Sweden. Bq is a part of the international standard (SI) system. To derive working levels from Bq, divide the Bq value by 3700.

Swedish officials first became aware of a residential radon problem in the mid 1960's. The initial concern arose because of findings of radiation emanating from a lightweight concrete made in part with alum shale. This material was found to be emitting radon, along with gamma radiation. Beginning in 1968, several reports were issued on the dangers of radon. Production of alum shale concrete was banned in 1974.

After initial investigations, it became apparent that building materials were only a minor component of Sweden's radon problem. Naturally occurring radon contamination, like that being found in the Reading Prong, was determined to be the primary contributor to the problem.

Emphasis on energy conservation in homes was seen as a major contributor to the radon problem. In 1974, the SSI published a document entitled "Radiation in Our Homes," which was distributed to local public health officials, and made available to the public. It clearly stated that an increased rate of lung cancer could result from decreased indoor ventilation rates, specifically as obtained through energy conservation measures. This was due to the fact that energy conservation efforts were aimed at sealing windows, doors, and other aboveground building parts, and not at foundations, a major entryway for radon. It was estimated that an increase of 20 lung cancer cases in Sweden would result for each average increase of 1pCi/1 of indoor radon.

The warnings in this booklet went largely ignored. In fact, a mass media representative reportedly told the SSI that "if we reproduce what you say here, we might scare people."

It wasn't until January of 1979 that Sweden's residential radon problem drew major attention in the press and public. Homes in a small community in central Sweden were found to have very high radon levels. The SSI and local authorities held an informational meeting for residents. The meeting attracted large scale media attention, and radon became a real problem to Swedes. This somewhat parallels what happened in Boyertown, Pennsylvania in later 1984, with the discovery and publicity of radon contamination at the Watras home.

Public concern in Sweden was significant. The SSI reported receiving 800 phone calls a day following the publicity. The concern was both over health and economic impacts.

Following these events, the government immediately appointed a Radon Commission, which the SSI had sought a year earlier. The Commission is composed of representatives of the SSI, Urban Planning Board, Karolinska Institute, and other government agencies. Within a week of its establishment, the Commission published an informational booklet, jointly prepared by the SSI, the Urban Planning Board, and the Board of Health and Welfare.

In May 1979, the Radon Commission published an interim report entitled "Preliminary Proposals for Action Against Radiation Risks in Buildings." The report contained:

Proposals for acceptable safe radon exposure limits;

Recommendations for extensive radon testing in each community to find high homes;

Proposals to find homes with building materials emitting radon; and Proposals to do geologic testing and surveying to find hot spots.

In 1982, results were published on the coordinated municipal testing of nearly 33,000 homes in Sweden [2] The cost of this survey was approximately $3 million. Several smaller testing programs were also undertaken, including one by the SSI, which looked at 512 homes in a random sampling.

The results of such testing are used as a tool in planning development in Swedish communities. With this information, planners can take high risk radon hot spots into account when devising building and development strategies.

Based on the SSI testing, the following estimates were made:

Radon concentration WL/Bequerels	Percent of buildings exceeding this concentration (municipal testing)	Percent of buildings exceeding this concentration (SSI random testing)	Number dwellings (SSI data)
0	100	100	3,500,000
>.054/200	38	3.5	120,000
>.108/400	11	1.0	35,000
>.54/2000	25

The Commission proposed a preliminary action level of 400 Bq, or approximately .11WL, meaning that immediate attention would be given to those homes with radon concentrations exceeding that level. That would, based on SSI estimates, include approximately 35,000 homes, or roughly 1 percent of the nation's homes. Later estimates have ranged as high as 50,000 to 100,000 homes. (Similar estimates have been made of the percentage of U.S. homes with high radon levels).

In November 1979, the Radon Commission wrote the government, proposing a means of assisting homeowners with large expenses related to radon mitigation. As a result, parliament approved a low-interest loan program for those homeowners with radon concentrations exceeding the action level of 400 Bq.

During the Swedish budgetary year 1981/1982, 300 loans were issued, averaging about $2,000, for a total cost of approximately $600,000.

In 1980, the Urban Planning Board introduced radon concentration limits in the national building code. It set the limit of radon concentration in new homes at 70 Bq (.02WL), 200 Bq (.05WL) in renovated homes, and 400 Bq (.11WL) in existing homes.

Enforcement of these building codes has not been as strict as it could be. The government policy announcement made while the task force was in Sweden contained provisions for toughening up enforcement of these codes.

In 1981, the SSI, Urban Planning Board, and Board of Health and Welfare jointly issued a comprehensive report summarizing the results of Sweden's radon programs to date. The Radon Commission also published a second interim report that year.

The reports reaffirmed the determination that the radon problem was due principally to natural emissions from the soil, and not from building materials. The highest radon concentrations were found to result from the combination of several conditions:

High radium concentrations in the soil.

Porous soil.

Faulty building design/construction (inadequate sealing of foundation spaces, etc.).

Low indoor ventilation rate.

Significant low indoor pressure, drawing in soil gas.

Use of radon rich building material.

It is felt that increased radon concentration leads to a corresponding increase in lung cancer risk. Even at relatively low levels, radon is thought to present a notable risk.

Recent estimates place the average radon concentration in Sweden at approximately 53 Bq. (.01WL). The corresponding lung cancer risk may be of the order of 1 in 10,000, or over 800 cases of lung cancer a year in Sweden. Epidemiological studies cited for the task force indicated that the actual number of radon-induced lung cancer is higher, at about 1,000 of a total of 2,500 lung cancer deaths each year.

Dr. Gunnar Bengtsson outlined the need to address the entire range of radon contamination in homes. Although the homes with the highest levels must be mitigated on a priority basis, in order to cut into the overall lung cancer rate, all exposures must be diminished.

It is thought that the bulk of radon-induced lung cancers are caused by relatively low exposures, below the 400 Bq action level. It is at these levels that the larger percentage of people are affected, not at the extremely high, uncommon levels. While eliminating the very high exposures reduces the risk faced by an individual, it does little to cut down on the collective risk faced by the entire population at risk.

For example, consider a group of 100 individuals exposed to varying levels of radon. Suppose 90 of them are exposed to levels between 50 and 100 Bq—relatively low, but still a risk. The other ten are exposed to levels exceeding the 400 Bq action level. If the ten with the high levels are remediated, the risk faced by those individuals has been reduced, but the collective risk faced by the entire 100 as a group has changed little.

In order to effectively address collective risk, and make a significant reduction in the total number of lung cancers, the overall average must be brought down. Dr. Bengtsson told the task force that the SSI hopes to eventually bring Sweden's national radon average down below 40 Bq (.01WL). This would result in a significant reduction in the number of radon-induced lung cancers each year in Sweden.

The cost of such a program could be enormous. It would involve finding not only the homes with very high levels, but also those with lower levels, anything above 40-50 Bq (.01WL). This would involve testing a very large number of homes, and then taking remedial action. While bringing very high levels down to a more acceptable range may be fairly easily achieved, bringing a home with 80 Bq down to 40 Bq will likely be much more costly and difficult. Dr. Bengtsson stated that such a program could eventually cost as much as one-half of one percent of Sweden's gross national product.

In 1983, the Commission published its final report, entitled "Radon in Dwelling." It further expanded the factors leading to high radon concentrations to include water concentration and soil permeability. It estimated the average home radon concentration throughout Sweden at 53 Bq (.01WL). The U.S. average is thought to be somewhat lower, although extreme levels, of the sort found at some homes in the Boyertown area, are far above the highest levels ever found in Sweden.

[2] For comparison, in the U.S., the most comprehensive testing base available has been compiled by the Terradex Corporation. From isolated tests done largely on an individual basis in almost every state, Terradex has an information base of approximately 16,000 tested homes as of October, 1985.

The number of existing homes exceeding the action level of 400 Bq (.11WL) has been placed at about 40,000, over 1% of the nation's dwellings. Some 500,000, or 14% of housing, may exceed the 70 Bq (.019WL) level. About 10% of all Swedish ground is believed to pose a high risk of radon contamination.

Remedial action costs have ranged from a few hundred Swedish crowns for installation/adjustment of simple ventilation systems to about 50,000 crowns for installation of forced ventilation with heat recovery. (There are currently about 7.5 Swedish crowns to the dollar.)

Sweden has had a great deal of success in mitigating radon contamination in homes. However, due to different building practices, this success may not be easily transferred to the U.S. Swedish homes are extremely energy efficient, with effective insulation against intrusion of soil gases or wind. Building a Swedish house was likened by one task force member to "putting a glass bottle on the ground." This efficiency, accompanied by the fact that most Swedish homes do not have basements, makes radon mitigation in new construction relatively simple. According to Bengt Olsson, Associate Director of the Swedish Council for Building Research, under current Swedish building practices, adequate quality control will be enough to ensure that radon will not enter a home.

Existing homes pose a more difficult problem. However, in one home visited by the task force, radon levels were reduced by 75-94% with the use of a very simple venting system. This inexpensive system consisted of one pipe rising from beneath the floor of each of two ground-level rooms, connecting, and venting the soil gases through the chimney, with the aid of a very small fan. Put into place by the homeowner, it has maintained these reduced levels for over four years. Operation and maintenance costs are minimal.

This home, in the Stockholm suburb of Sollentuna (pop. 50,000), is among the more than 2,500 homes tested there under the municipal health and environment department program. 500 homes were tested at the municipality's expense, and the remaining 2,000+ at individual expense, with equipment obtained in mass quantity by the municipality. The total number of homes tested continues to grow as more homeowners take part in the program.

Information on radon and its health effects was provided to all homeowners in Sollentuna and testing began, at a cost of approximately $50 per home. The municipality offered to perform the tests, with equipment at owner's expense, in every home. If high levels were found, the municipality provided advice on mitigation. Once mitigation has been done, follow-up testing will be conducted, to monitor radon levels.

A Swedish realtor told his New Jersey counterpart that there had been a period in the late '70's when home sales plummeted in areas with known radon problems. He saw this as being an unwarranted panic, something an official of the Physical Planning Board referred to as a "radon fever" which struck Sweden.

Once prospective homebuyers learned more about the radon problem, and advances were made in detecting and mitigating radon contamination, conditions returned to normal. It is now routine for radon inspections to be part of the home-buying process, with price ajustments being made in some cases to cover the costs of any necessary remedial action.

II. RECOMMENDATIONS

While the radon problem still contains more unknowns than knowns, there are actions which can take place. Activities do not have to take place in isolation, and can go on concurrently. With the task force, federal, state, and private, sector interests have worked together to try to assess the state's radon problem, and how they might work together to reach toward a solution. Following are some observations and recommendations, based on the information gathered in Sweden, and it is hoped that they will be considered as the State of New Jersey undertakes its radon program.

Radon is a national problem. According to data compiled by the Terradex Company in California, limited testing has indicated at least one finding of radon exceeding 4 pico-Curies per liter in 45 states.

From the information gathered in Sweden, and from growing evidence in the U.S., it is clear that an effective approach to the radon problem will have to involve a blend of federal, state, and local governments, along with the private sector. Significant delays in taking action will result in incresasing occurrence of lung cancer.

A. Federal responsibilities

The federal government has the most expertise in radon study, and should make that expertise fully available to the states. Dissemination of information is a critical component of an affective radon program, and an aggressive public information program must be institutionalized.

The federal government has resources which make it best suited for developing technical advances and scientific study. A national assessment, which is needed to determine the scope of the radon problem in this country, must be conducted by the federal government. The federal government can provide the combined services of environmental, health, and housing experts to develop mitigation and detection techniques, health guidelines, and suggested building modifications to preclude radon contamination in homes.

The federal government can also contribute by establishing a national radon program to coordinate activities among the states. It should have the leadership role in developing and improving effective, low-cost radon mitigation methods. The federal government should establish adequate health guidelines, guidelines which indivudual states can base their programs on and which will allow homeowners to assess the level of risk they might be exposed to.

The federal government can also assist states in protecting consumers from fraudulent or faulty radon detection services. The federal government has facilities to calibrate testing equipment, to ensure that detectors work properly, and that readings made by testing firms are accurate. These facilities should be made available to the states, for use in their programs.

The federal government should also explore, the feasibility of establishing a testing/mitigation voluntary certification program, or providing guidance to states for them to establish such programs.

The question of funding an adequate radon program, and providing financial assistance to needy homeowners for radon mitigation is a difficult question. With the current federal budget situation, it is clear that the federal government will be able to assume only limited financial responsibility for anything beyond basic research and demonstration work.

There are, however, certain areas where the federal government might be able to provide assistance. The Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA] has stated that naturally-occurring radon could be considered a natural disaster, as are hurricanes, floods, and earthquakes. Such a determination will make it possible for the governor of a state affected by extensive radon contamination to seek federal relief through a presidential declaration of disaster. New Jersey is seeking to design its radon assessment program to be in accordance with FEMA requirements for a declaration of disaster, if warranted.

Secondly, through the existing tax codes, homeowners could seek relief by deducting radon mitigation expenses undertaken for the purpose of protecting health as a medical deduction. While such a claim has not yet been filed, the Internal Revenue Service has stated that it would consider one, and that there are precedents which could make a medical deduction possible.

There may be other means of assisting homeowners in need without putting an inordinate strain on the federal budget. Any such alternatives should continue to be explored.

B. State and local responsibilities

Much of the implementation of an effective radon program will likely lie with the states and municipalities. Funding assistance, such as that which has been provided in Pennsylvania, will likely fall to the states, and not the federal government.

Dissemination of information to the public should be a priority. Distribution of printed material, use of a toll-free information telephone service, training of local health officials, and public information seminars should all be part of an effective informational program.

There is also a need to provide information to potentially-effected businesses. Builders, real estate interests, bankers, and firms looking to locate within high risk areas should all be the targets of an aggressive information agenda. Effectively accomplished, this would work to stave off unwarranted economic harm.

The building and realty industries have demonstrated an interest in addressing the radon problem in New Jersey. Along with the National Association of Homebuilders Research Foundation, they should be incorporated into state and federal plans and efforts. The expertise these groups have to offer would be of great assistance to the state and federal governments, and with little or no funding, could provide significant insight and advances in the areas of radon mitigation and information dissemination. Without the cooperation of these industries, development and enforcement of advanced building practices will be more difficult, and their early interest should be fostered.

The states should coordinate in-state detection efforts, to be able to determine small-scale distribution of radon contamination and better inform their residents. This would complement the national assessment, which will not pinpoint specific problem areas. As in Sweden, this information should be made readily available to community planners and developers.

Schools should be tested for radon problems as well as homes. Parents should know what their children may be exposed to, and teachers and staff should know what, if any, threats their work environment may pose. States and municipalities have an obligation to see that the buildings under their jurisdiction—schools as well as other public buildings—are safe for those working in them.

Additionally, the problem of high radon levels in water supplies should be studied. Water with high levels of radon can lead to elevated indoor levels, as the gas volatizes from running water supplies, such as showers, sinks, dishwaters. Water concentrations of approximately 10,000 picoCuries per liter would lead to air concentrations of about 1 picoCurie per liter.

States should take an active interest in protecting consumers from victimization by unqualified or negligent testing and mitigation firms. The need for a certification programs should be assessed, and voluntary participation in such programs should be encouraged.

Epidemiological studies should also be conducted, using state-specific information to more accurately assess the health impacts of radon contamination in each state.

The states must also explore possible means of providing financial assistance to homeowners. Low interest loan programs, direct funding/subsidizing of testing, and direct funding of mitigation have been attempted or considered. Once an assessment of the scope of a state's problem is completed, the low interest loan and mitigation assistance issues, as well as other possible means of assistance, can be more reasonably considered.●

AUTOMOBILE FUEL ECONOMY STANDARDS

● Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, today I am submitting for the record a short article I wrote and which was published in the March 13, 1986, edition of the Christian Science Monitor.

The article is entitled "Deficit Fuel-Hardiness," and in it I discuss the Federal budget consequences of backing away from our commitment to passenger car fuel economy. As we set out, during the next few weeks, to forge a budget resolution, I would like my colleagues to bear in mind that we can make some significant progress toward deficit reduction with very little effort.

The only effort that will be required of this Congress to take a $500 million step toward our Gramm-Rudman deficit goal is to prevent any future rollback of Federal fuel economy standards. What would we get in return for our efforts? A half-billion dollars is equal to half the proposed budget cut for the Department of Health and Human Services and is greater than the total cuts proposed for the Departments of Education, Agriculture, Housing and Urban Development, Interior, and State. It is $100 million more than we will spend in 1986 on nutrition for older Americans. It is enough to run Head Start programs for 450,000 underprivileged preschoolers for half a year. It is more than the total funding for both conservation programs and research contained in the administration's 1987 budget request for the Department of Energy.

I have no doubt that my colleagues will hear from both Ford and GM that fuel economy standards make little sense in today's environment. These giant automakers will claim that they are helpless before the tide of consumer demand sweeping Americans into auto showrooms demanding big, fast, gas-guzzlers.

Do not be fooled by the rhetoric. I am also inserting for today's RECORD a short article that recently appeared in Ward's Auto World. In that article, Ford's vice president—North American Sales Operations Louis E. Lastaif is quoted saying that the automakers do have mechanisms available to help them meet fuel economy standards. I submit that this statement to a widely read industry trade publication reflects the truth; that it is largely the decisions made by the automakers themselves that dictate whether they will meet fuel economy standards.

Let us not be fuel hardy. Let us not be fooled by automaker rhetoric. Let us stand for rational energy policy and prudent budget policy and prevent any further erosion of fuel economy standards.

DEFICIT FUEL-HARDINESS

(By Daniel J. Evans)

In light of two of today's prominent news headlines—the deficit and falling oil prices—yet another confusing signal is coming from Washington. Just as the federal government is taking a hard line on deficit spending, it is lending a sympathetic ear and may give away $500 million to two unlikely recipients of federal largesse: Ford and General Motors.

These two hugely profitable concerns will get—and the government will lose—almost $500 million if the Department of Transportation (DOT) accedes to their request to reduce the average fuel economy level for the fleet of cars they sell in 1987 and 1988.

This half-billion dollar bonanza would be expensive gilding on the estimated $280 million gift received by the automakers when DOT lowered, at the automakers' request, the fuel efficiency standard (Corporate Average Fuel Economy standard, or CAFE) for 1986.

Congress established the CAFE standard in 1975 to promote increased fuel economy of automobiles.

The goal was to help insulate America from the economic havoc that excessive reliance on imported oil can wreak. Congress gave the automakers a full 10 years to implement the technology necessary to meet the 27.5 miles per gallon standard set for 1985 and beyond. The $500 million that might be given away to Ford and GM is for fines owed due to failure to meet the standard.

GM and Ford claim they cannot sell enough fuel-efficient cars to meet the standard because low gasoline prices induce consumers to buy gas-guzzlers. Well then, how can Chrysler make record profits while offering consumers a complete line of cars and complying with the standard? Clearly, the technology is there to meet the standard, and implementing the technology is in the national interest. Chrysler shows that under this sound national policy business may prosper.

Ford and GM didn't meet the standard because they consciously made the marketing decisons which caused them to miss it. They promoted sales of their largest cars, which yield the largest profits for them.

To reward their recalcitrance is outrageous.

Today's headlines may lead one to ask why we should take the time to worry about oil vulnerability. We seem to be awash in oil; prices have dropped precipitously and continue their downward slide. Yet, a glance even a short distance up the energy roadway gives one cause for deep concern.

Recent Interior Department estimates indicate that domestic oil production will fall from 11.1 to 7.6 million barrels per day between 1985 and 1995 and that net oil imports will rise during the same period from 5.1 to 11.7 million barrels per day. Certainly, today's low oil prices create no incentive for new exploration or production. Foreign sources inevitably will continue to supply a significant portion of our petroleum needs.

We cannot let today's sagging oil prices result in sagging enthusiasm for conservation. Prices at the pump, in inflation-adjusted dollars, are lower then they were 2 years ago. Price plays a significant role in creating incentives to conserve. Yet, other government policies, such as CAFE standards, are important, supplementary incentives to conserve. To lower the standard at a time when market forces are least able to maintain pressure for continued energy efficiency is the antithesis of responsible government.

A lowered fuel standard will only fuel the deficit. But preventing a lowered standard will demonstrate our commitment to an energy efficient future.

FORD, CHEVY SHUN MINICAR BATTLE, FOR NOW

Ford Motor Co. and General Motors Corp's Chevrolet Motor Div. have no immediate plans, WAW learns, to take on the growing number of low-price minicars entering the U.S. market—other than with existing models.

Chrysler Corp.'s decision to introduce low-price versions of its aging Omni/Horizon L-body subcompacts under the "America" marque may change those plans, but otherwise Ford will fight it out with Escort—introduced as an '81 model—and Chevy will rely upon its 12-year-old Chevette and 2-year-old Sprint supplied by Suzuki Motor Co.. Ltd., both base-priced in the $5,000–$6,000 range.

"We're in a different position than the others" Ford Vice President-North American Sales Operations Louis E. Lataif tells WAW. "We've just changed over Escort for '86½, and they are in short supply. It would be silly of us to cut prices when demand is there. Also, what do you do? A 'strippie' that may not be competitive?"

Ford needs Escort volume to offset poorer fuel economy of its larger models and therefore meet federal corporate average fuel economy (CAFE) standards currently stablized at 26 mpg (9L/100km). Mr. Lataif agrees Ford undoubtedly would be forced to take some pricing action if "we needed it to keep Escort volume up" for CAFE's sake.

Ford's entry level, small-car strategy calls for importing Festiva, a minicar designed by its 25-percent-owned Mazda Motor Corp. subsidiary and to be built by Mazda affiliate Kia Industrial Co. Ltd. of Korea for export to the U.S. starting with the '87 model year. It'll also have higher-line, Mazda-derived small cars in 1988 from a new Ford plant under construction in Hermosillo, Mexico.

GM Vice President/Chevrolet General Manager Robert D. Burger says Chevy dealers already have all the car lines they can handle. "We've got all we can do—from Chevette to Corvette," he says.

If Chevette loses ground to low-price competitors, "then we'll have to do something about Chevette," he says, quickly adding: "No, we won't have a Scooter." That refers to a past Chevy tactic of removing the rear seats from Chevettes to slash its price, resulting in an often-maligned version called Scooter.

Chevy, of course, also has quota-limited supplies of the 3-cyl. Sprint to compete at around $5,400. Suzuki contemplates Canadian production—perhaps in conjunction with GM—in the late '80s. That output presumably would provide Chevy all the minicars it may need.

DAVID SCHWARTZ HONORED BY DEMOCRATIC POLICY COMMISSION

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased today to recognize the accomplishments of New Jersey Assemblyman David Schwartz, who is being honored by the Democratic Policy Commission for his innovative efforts to stimulate affordable housing in New Jersey.

A member of the New Jersey Assembly since 1978, David's commitment to making homes more affordable and improving the quality of urban life has resulted in initiatives that are both cost effective and compassionate. Over the past 7 years, he has crafted legislation that has helped 8,000 New Jersey residents buy their own homes, generated close to 5,000 new apartments and kept 10,000 people—3,800 families—from being evicted from their homes with temporary mortgage and rental payment assistance. His legislation has led to over $40 million in needed home improvements.

In these days when so many of our young people despair of ever owning their own homes, when families are forced to pay a higher and higher percentage of their incomes for housing, and when people are forced from their homes because of temporary economic problems, David's programs have demonstrated sensible, successful solutions.

Mr. President, I am proud to join in honoring David Schwartz for his considerable accomplishments, which have benefited all New Jerseyites. His efforts stand as a testament to government which is both fiscally and socially responsible; government which works for the average American.●

EFFECTIVE DATES OF TAX REFORM

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance met today for the first markup session on tax reform. In their usual opening statements, Senator after Senator raised issues running the gamut of the Tax Code. But in virtually every case, the issue of effective dates was raised.

It is no great secret that the effective dates in the House tax reform bill are creating havoc in the business community. Businesses cannot evaluate the economic consequences of their investments because they cannot ascertain the tax consequences of their investments.

In my opening remarks, I, too, expressed concern with the problems created by the effective dates in the pending tax reform legislation. I also suggested that the members of the Committee on Finance agree not to sign any conference report on tax reform legislation this year unless the effective dates for such legislation are substantially in conformance with the effective dates in the Senate version of the tax reform bill. I was extremely pleased when my colleagues on the Finance Committee expressed support for this idea. In fact, 18 members of the Finance Committee signed a statement expressing exactly this sentiment. I hope this statement will help alleviate some of the uncertainty involved in the tax reform process and enable the business community to go forward with some of the investment decisions it has had to postpone pending resolution of the effective date issue.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire text of the statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT ON EFFECTIVE DATES, MARCH 19, 1986

The undersigned members of the Committee on Finance agree not to sign the conference report on any tax reform legislation passed by the Senate in 1986 unless the effective dates for such legislation are substantially in conformance with the effective dates as passed by the Senate. The undersigned further agree not to engage in any conference negotiations relating to substantive issues in the tax reform legislation unless a majority of the conferees from the House of Representatives agree to accept effective dates in accordance with the spirit of the preceding sentence.

YOUNG WRITER'S CONTEST

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I should like to take a moment to officially congratulate four outstanding young writers from South Carolina. Mary Rebecca Henderson of Lexington, Christine Clawsonn of Cowpens, Simmy Sims of Central, and Elizabeth Grey of Seneca, have all been chosen as winners of the 1985-86 Young Writers Contest. Their winning entries were chosen from a field of 8,000. The judging was done by an extremely diverse panel, which included some of my distinguished colleagues. The 105 winning entries will be published in the 1986 Rainbow Collection: Stories and Poetry by Young People which is due out in April.

The Young Writer's Contest Foundation was created to further the efforts of educators in improving the basic communication skills of young people in the United States. By involving first through eighth graders in a national writing competition, and by publishing an anthology of the winning entries as the prize, the Young Writer's Contest provides students with the excitement of challenge and the satisfaction of recognition. In addition, it offers educators a stimulating motivational tool. Entries can be in the form of a short story, a poem, or an essay. They are judged on creativity, imagination, originality, grammar and structure, and a host of other factors.

Mary, who is in the eighth grade, wrote a poem entitled "Never Fall in Love." Elizabeth, a fifth grader, wrote a story called "The Examination," while Christine and Simmy, who are both in the seventh grade, wrote stories entitled "A Trip in Time" and "Nemesis," respectively.

All four girls have done an outstanding job. They represent South Carolina to the literary world. I can think of no better representative.●

U.S. AND SOVIET RELATIONS WITH GREECE

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, Senator LARRY PRESSLER, my colleague on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and chairman of the European Subcommittee, has recently contributed to the Christian Science Monitor a most useful and incisive analysis of U.S. security interests in the Eastern Mediterranean. Entitled "U.S. and Soviet Relations with Greece," the article seeks to promote a more balanced approach to America's relations with and priorities toward the countries of Turkey, Greece, and Cyprus. The Senator argues that a policy that recognizes the equivalent importance of Greece and Turkey as allies has made America's appeal in the region more persuasive than that of the Soviet Union, and he goes on to document that recent improvements in U.S. relations with Greece.

Mr. President, I recommend Senator PRESSLER's article to my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Mar. 6, 1986]

U.S. AND SOVIET RELATIONS WITH GREECE

(By Larry Pressler)

Over the last two years, the United States has greatly improved its security position in the eastern Mediterranean by balancing its relations more equally. In the past, US policy was often seen as narrow, focusing on Greece or Turkey or Cyprus. Bilateral relations and NATO strategy often suffered as a result. However, a new maturity now seems to be infusing United States policy toward the eastern Mediterranean. Secretary of State George Shultz has broadened the policy focus to one that is now more equally Greece and Turkey and Cyprus.

This more balanced assessment of America's priorities, which recognizes the roughly equivalent importance of Greece and Turkey as allies, has made America's appeal in the region more persuasive than that of the Soviets. The effects are most obvious in our relations with Greece.

A wide variety of settings illustrate significant improvement in US-Greek cooperation since 1984.

Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou reacted to American information identifying Soviet spies in Greece by quickly arresting them last September. American and Greek antiterrorist experts have been training together in both countries for several months, and Greece's minister of culture, actress Melina Mercouri, has proposed an "American Month in Greece." Each of these events is the product of a renewed Greek and US determination to revitalize relations.

US-Greek cooperation heightened even further on Jan. 7 when the two nations signed the General Security of Military Information Agreement. It obligates both sides to safeguard information and technology exchanges, and is viewed as an indication of Greek seriousness in improving bilateral ties. In response, the US notifed Greece on Jan. 11 of approval for the sale of 40 F-16s to Greece.

Other talks are also progressing.

A Greek delegation came to the United States in December to discuss a technical accord on industrial cooperation in defense, and civil aviation talks will resume soon. In addition, the United States is now operating two powerful Voice of America transmitters in Greece under an expired agreement which the Greeks still respect.

In sum, all indications suggest that the basic tenor of the United States relationship with Greece has significantly changed since 1984. Recent progress on many fronts seems to indicate that when the US base agreement expires in 1988, the renewal could be easier than previously expected. Indeed, Mr. Papandreou has subtly shifted his position in the last few weeks. He now states that any government in power in 1988 can introduce new legislation to support a new agreement. In anticipation that real progress can be made on this issue, US contact with Greece has increased. Undersecretary of State Michael Armacost went to Greece in October. Secretary of State Shultz met with the Greek foreign minister, and Mr. Shultz plans to meet with Papandreou this spring.

Revitalized US-Greek relations are born of three factors: Papandreou's postelection recognition of the damage done by excessive anti-American rhetoric; Greek interest in eliminating the terrorist threat to civilized international relations; and an American awareness that the period of rhetorical anti-Americanism is past history.

By contrast, 1985 was a particularly poor year for the Soviets. After the Greek spy scandal, the Soviets withdrew their ambassador, Igor Andropov, son of the former premier. The Communist Party also won its lowest percentage of the Greek vote in recent times (9.89 percent) in 1985. Similarly, on Cyprus the Communists experienced an even greater electoral setback in recent parliamentary elections.

Only a year ago, Soviet Ambassador Andropov was riding high in Athens. The Soviets had moved agressively to fill a gap perceived to exist in the hearts of Greeks disillusioned by American actions.

The Soviets apparently felt that the United States had lost Greek support in the left and center for embracing the Greek junta and that more were disillusioned on the right over the United States response to the invasion of Cyprus by Turkey.

Soviet attempts to woo Greece took many forms. Thousands of Greeks have been embraced by the Soviets during visits to the Soviet Union. Hundreds of Greek and Cypriot youths have been provided free college educations at Eastern-bloc universities. The Soviets have also moved to invest in Greece. In 1985 Greece and the Soviet Union signed a 10-year economic and technical cooperation agreement.

By contrast, the US association with Greece is longstanding. Deep links tie our two countries together: similar histories, cultures, and philosophies of government, respect for the individual, and a stress on religion and family.

It is clear that the US now has another chance to reestablish the extremely close ties once enjoyed with this strategically situated country.

The comparative United States advantage over the Soviets in Greece and Cyprus will continue if the United States learns from its recent experience in improving relations with the area. The United States must not allow itself to frame the issue as "Turkey or Greece or Cyprus." The correct formulation for American policy is "Turkey and Greece and Cyprus." The United States cannot make this sort of mistake as it has in the past. American security interests in the eastern Mediterranean depend on it.●

TEMPORARY EXTENSION OF CERTAIN PROGRAMS RELATING TO HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the Democratic leader, I would now ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to House Joint Resolution 563, to provide for the extension of certain housing programs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 563) to provide for the temporary extension of certain programs relating to housing and community development, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be considered as having been read the second time by title.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 563) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AFGHANISTAN DAY

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to the consideration of Calendar Item No. 548, Senate Joint Resolution 272, designating March 21, 1986, as Afghanistan Day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 272) to authorize and request the President to issue a proclamation designating March 21, 1986, as "Afghanistan Day," a day to commemorate the struggle of the people of Afghanistan against the occupation of their country by Soviet forces.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. Humphrey. Mr. President, the brutal Soviet occupation of Afghanistan entered its seventh tragic year in December. What Moscow refers to as a "small contingent" of troops now numbers 120,000. Fully one-half of Afghanistan's population has been violently uprooted, forced into the teeming refugee camps of neighboring states or into internal refugee status near Kabul or other Afghan cities. Casualties are currently estimated at 1 million, out of a population of 15 million. In short, more than half of Afghanistan's people have been violently uprooted and none have been left untouched by the barbarity visited upon them by the Soviet Union.

In spite of the astounding proportions of warfare in Afghanistan, the response of the American public is only slowly becoming audible. Because of the "iron media curtain" drawn by the Kremlin around its savage drama, many in the West have been unaware of the genocidal proportions of Soviet actions in Afghanistan. An oft-invaded people, the Afghans were capable until only recently of defending their borders by traditional means. Their heritage discourages them from asking others to defend them; to this day they want not foreign manpower but materiel and humanitarian assistance with which to oppose yet another invasion from the north. We must endeavor to use every means at our disposal to ensure that Soviet designs are thwarted once again. To sit idly by while the Kremlin adds another wing to its empire at the expense of these brave people is unconscionable.

Our moral duty is compounded by the absolute horror which charaterizes Soviet strategy and tactics in Afghanistan. Once it became clear to Moscow's planners that they had vastly underestimated the ability and determination of the Afghan resistance movement, the Politburo apparently decided that if the Soviets could not control the countryside they would instead empty it. Thus they have bombed, slashed, tortured, burned and raped their way through an essentially defenseless population, with absolutely no regard for the lives of women, children, and the elderly. Opponents of the regime are executed with regularity. In an effort to "Sovietize" Afghanistan, Moscow is attempting to educate a whole generation in Marxist-Leninist doctrine.

Soviet tactics preclude nothing. The U.N.'s Special Rapporteur on human rights violations in Afghanistan, Mr. Felix Ermacora, has uncovered instances of the Soviets training dogs to attack children and the elderly as well as reports of handcuffed Afghans being dropped from helicopters while Soviet troops fire on them from below. American media coverage of this twisted war has been slight in spite of these crimes, a fact partially attributable to the Soviet attitude expressed by Moscow's Ambassador to Pakistan, Vitaly Smirnov:

> Stop trying to penetrate Afghanistan with the so-called Mujahedin. From now on, the bandits and the so-called journalists—French, American, British and others—accompanying them will be killed.

When the true story is told, though, the reaction is astonishing. A recent article in Reader's Digest entitled "Agony in Afghanistan" induced thousands of concerned Americans to write me expressing their outrage. Most were unaware of the atrocious conditions in Afghanistan, a fact I find unbelievable in light of the duration and intensity of the war.

Afghanistan Day, March 21, 1986, is partially an attempt to bring the Afghans' struggle to the attention of America and the world. It is also an attempt to let the people of Afghanistan know that the Government and the people of this great Nation are behind them. We must not falter in our efforts to shine the spotlight of world public opinion on the massive violation of human rights being perpetrated in Afghanistan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 272) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 272), and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 272

Whereas Afghanistan, more than six years after the Soviet invasion, remains a nation occupied and terrorized by over one hundred eighteen thousand Soviet troops;

Whereas the continued Soviet occupation of Afghanistan is causing enormous suffering among the people of Afghanistan, as well as the deprivation of their basis right of national sovereignity;

Whereas between one quarter and one-third of Afghanistan's prewar population has been driven into exile, killed, wounded, or internally displaced;

Whereas the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan undermines the spirit and intention of the Declaration of Principles of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, which the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics signed at Helsinki in 1975;

Whereas the puppet regime of Babrak Karmal, installed and maintained by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, has denied the people of Afghanistan their rights ot self-determination, in violation of the United Charter;

Whereas the United Nations General Assembly has passed seven resolutions calling for "the immediate withdrawal of the foreign troops from Afghanistan";

Whereas on December 13, 1985, the United Nations General Assembly passed an unprecedented resolution on human rights in Afghanistan endorsing the United Nations Special Rapporteur's report demonstrating "gross, massive, and increasing human rights violations in Afghanistan";

Whereas the undaunted resistance of the Afghan freedom fighters against the Soviet occupational forces is in inspiration to the free world; and

Whereas the people of Afghanistan observe March 21 as the start of each new year and as a symbol of the Nation's rebirth: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating March 21, 1986, as "Afghanistan Day", and calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

DESIGNATION OF THE JOSEPH P. ADDABBO FEDERAL BUILDING

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of H.R. 4399, a bill to designate the Federal building located in Jamaica, Queens, NY, as the Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

> A bill (H.R. 4399) to designate the Federal building located in Jamaica, Queens, New York, as the "Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building."

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as having been read the first and second times and that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of legislation to designate the Federal building located in Jamaica, NY, as the Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building. This is a fitting tribute to a man I have been privileged to work closely with over the past several years.

JOE ADDABBO, since his first election to Congress in 1960, has accomplished something remarkable. He has been a fighter for his district—a Congressman every resident of the Sixth District should be grateful to have as their representative. But he has also shown a remarkable national perspective on issues affecting every American. I think this is most evident in his work as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee.

JOE ADDABBO has always been for a strong defense, but he has always insisted that every penny be spent wisely. I think we would be hard-pressed to find someone who could compete with his intelligence and attention to detail. On a more personal side, JOE has always been accessible to discuss even the smallest issue.

I think it is fitting that the Federal Building in Jamaica, Queens, should be named in honor of JOE ADABBO. It is a small gesture, considering what JOE has given over his 25 years in Congress. I urge my colleagues to join me in honoring JOE ADDABBO through swift passage of this measure.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate has agreed to consider H.R. 4399, a bill to designate the Federal Office Building in Jamaica, Queens, as the Joseph P. Addabbo Building. This bill, introduced by my colleague from New York, Representative MARIO BIAGGI, passed the House this morning by unanimous consent.

The construction of a Federal office building in Jamaica was JOE ADDABBO's dream, and without his efforts, that structure would never have been built.

In the late 1960's JOE wanted to see depressed downtown Jamaica restored to its former vibrance and vitality. He knew that bringing a Federal presence to Queens would accomplish this. To convince the Congress to build a Federal office building in downtown Queens was no easy task in 1969, nor would it be today. But JOE ADDABBO's determination knew no limits. In 1980, for example, the matter had reached the House Public Works Committee for a vote. When the vote was stalled for lack of a quorum, JOE convinced Congressman John Murphy to recess his Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee hearing to allow Members to return to the Public Works Committee for a vote. As anyone who has worked with JOE ADDABBO will attest, he knows how to get things done. The measure passed 32 to 1.

I have been privileged over the years to collaborate with JOE ADDABBO on many projects, and probably none more important than the Federal building. This $93 million building will house the Northeastern Program Service Center for the Social Security Administration. The center prepares checks totaling $1.5 billion each month for 5.5 million Social Security beneficiaries, about one-sixth of the Nation's total. I joined JOE on this legislation as one of my first efforts after coming to the Senate. It took us several years to achieve, but JOE was indefatigable—and unstoppable.

JOE ADDABBO's efforts on behalf of Queens and all of New York deserve great praise and acclaim. Today, we mean to pay him a simple tribute. It is one he richly deserves, and I hope my colleagues will join me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill (H.R. 4399) was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to table the motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

THE EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the minority leader if he is in a position to confirm any or all of the following nominations on the Executive Calendar: Calendar No. 659, Calendar No. 660, Calendar Nos. 703 and 704 under the Army, Calendar Nos. 705 and 706 under the Navy, Calendar Nos. 707 and 709 under the Marine Corps, and all nominations placed on the Secretary's desk, with the exception of the Foreign Service nomination of Edwin G. Corr.

I state for the information of the Democratic leader that the two Labor Committee nominees were reported out with a quorum present.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I was going to ask the distinguished assistant Republican leader about whether or not these two nominees had been reported out in accordance with the rules or whether in violation of the rules they had been polled out. When they were first placed on the calendar, it was my understanding they were polled out, but I am now told by the distinguished assistant Republican leader that the committee has met and re-reported them, this time with assurances that a quorum of the committee was physically present at the time they were reported. Therefore, there is no objection.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me amend the inquiry to include Calendar item No. 708. I said 707 and 709. That should have included 708 under the Marine Corps.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection on this side to the nominations that have been enumerated.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nominations just identified, and that they be considered en bloc and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I very much thank the Democratic leader for his cooperation, and assistance.

I share with him, I think, the appreciation that these nominations are coming through and being reported out with a quorum present rather than through the polling procedure. I have always shared his view on that. I think it has a very good effect on our efforts.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, of course, I appreciate it too on behalf of not only myself but also on behalf of the Members on this side. The distinguished majority whip has from the beginning supported this effort to comply with the rules. I am glad that the committees are not doing it.

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. on Thursday, March 20, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. At the conclusion of routine morning business, the Senate will resume the motion to proceed to S. 1017, the regional airport bill. The Senate could also be asked to turn to any other legislative or executive items cleared for action; therefore, rollcall votes can be expected throughout the day on Thursday, March 20, 1986.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE ON FRIDAY

Mr. President, let me respond on behalf of the majority leader to the question earlier in the day of the Democratic leader, with regard to Friday's activity, if I may share that.

We shall have a cloture vote on the regional airport bill, on the motion to proceed to that issue. If cloture is invoked, there would be further votes, indeed, on amendments to the airport bill which are pending and being considered. Other items could generate and will generate votes on Friday.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority whip. Does the majority whip know at this point when the Senate will come in on Friday and as to what hour the vote on the cloture motion will occur in the event it is an hour that is outside the cloture rule?

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I believe the convening hour will be at 9 o'clock on Friday. It is not ordered as yet, of course, but that would be the thought, at 9 a.m. Then the cloture vote would occur at approximately 10:30 or 11 a.m. on Friday.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished assistant Republican leader.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I just caught the tail end of the statement. What was the schedule that the assistant majority leader was sketching out on the cloture vote?

Mr. SIMPSON. I share with my friend from Maryland that it is the leader's intent to have the cloture vote on the motion to proceed to the regional airport bill around the hour of 10:30 a.m on Friday.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SIMPSON. And there could be other votes throughout the day, I say to the Senator from Maryland.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, is there any further business from the Democratic leader?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished assistant Republican leader. I have nothing further today.

Mr. SIMPSON. Therefore, Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to and, at 7:02 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thurday, March 20, 1986, at 10 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, March 19, 1986

The House met at 10 a.m.

The SPEAKER. Today we have the distinct pleasure of having one of the renowned clergy of the world praying for this House, the Reverend Dr. Billy Graham, Evangelist, Montreat, NC.

PRAYER

The Reverend Dr. Billy Graham, Evangelist, Montreat, NC, offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, we thank Thee for the privilege of pausing at the beginning of this session to turn in prayer to Thee, knowing that Thou dost hear the prayers of all who come to Thee in faith.

We confess we live in a troubled, confused, and dangerous world, and in our hearts we know we are not adequate to solve the problems that face us. We confess that our own lives often mirror the troubles of our world. Give us the humility and courage, O God, to confess our sins and turn to Thee for the forgiveness and wisdom we so desperately need.

We commit this day's deliberations into Thy hands. We are reminded from the Scriptures that the legislators of a nation are called to be "ministers of God for good" (Romans 13:4). We pray that this may be fulfilled in every thought, word, and action of this body, knowing that some day we must all give account to Thee. Help us not to seek what is easy or self-serving, but what is right and just in Thy sight. May each Member today be motivated by the wisdom, peace, justice, and compassion of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Above all, in the midst of our busyness give us the discipline daily to deepen our faith and to seek first in our lives Thy Kingdom and Thy righteousness. This we pray in the name of our Lord and Savior. Amen.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). The Chair will receive two 1-minute speeches.

REV. DR. BILLY GRAHAM

(Mr. WATKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, after the resurrection, St. Mark tells us that Christ appeared before the 11 as they were eating, and he upbraided them for not believing those who had seen him after he had risen. St. Mark quotes him as saying: "Go ye into the world and preach the Gospel to every creature * * *."

Mr. Speaker, no man in history has ever touched so many lives with the word of Christ as Billy Graham. Since his first crusade in 1949, he has literally spoken to millions in person and many millions more through television, movies, his magazine, newspaper columns and 12 books, many of which continue to sell to those seeking inspiration.

Reverend Graham is the son of a dairy farmer and sees Christ as a living and loving Christ and preaches an essential message in all of his sermons, regardless of the language of the listeners. That message is: Man rebelled against God and so he was separated from God by sin. Christ died, was buried and rose again, and men need to repent of their sins and receive Him as their Savior.

Reverend Graham is an activist. He has led his crusades in 63 countries around the world. He has been invited as a guest of Presidents, back to Harry Truman's days, and, Dr. Graham, we welcome you in the House of Representatives today.

Mr. WHITLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WHITLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WATKINS] and my good friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS], who are president and vice president respectively of the House Prayer Breakfast Group, in welcoming Dr. Billy Graham here as our guest chaplain this morning.

Dr. Graham is a native and resident of my State of North Carolina. We are very proud of him, and we are delighted to have him here today.

REV. DR. BILLY GRAHAM

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, I also would like to add my voice to those of my colleagues and welcome the Reverend Dr. Billy Graham and to thank him for his opening prayer for this session.

Many of you know of the lifetime work of Dr. Graham and the impact that he has had on millions of people throughout this world. It is a distinct honor and pleasure to have him here today.

I want to extend an invitation that all of you have already received, but a reminder, that Dr. Graham will be speaking to a joint gathering of House and Senate Members in the Hart Senate Office Building at noon, and each Member of the House is invited to attend. We hope that you can be there.

Dr. Graham, welcome to the House of Representatives. We are delighted to have you with us today.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, family responsibilities required me to miss rollcall No. 60. Had I been here, I would have voted "aye."

JOSEPH P. ADDABBO FEDERAL BUILDING

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 4399) to designate the Federal building located in Jamaica, Queens, NY, as the "Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of having the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HOWARD], the chairman of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, explain the bill, and I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. I thank the gentleman, the ranking minority member of our Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for yielding to me, to explain this bill.

Mr. Speaker, JOSEPH PATRICK ADDABBO has served with distinction in this body since 1961. He is one of the most highly respected Members of this body.

I know him as an outstanding legislator and a warm, compassionate friend. It can be truly said of JOSEPH ADDABBO he has never said an unkind word about anyone. Quiet, effective, dedicated, he has done an outstanding job for his country, his home State of New York, and for the district he has so ably represented so many years.

He personally was involved in bringing a Federal building to Jamaica, Queens, a rundown, debilitated section of New York City. He was the one whose desire and drive made this possible. The Federal building is almost completed. It will be the fulcrum for the economic growth in the entire area. This is typical of the way JOSEPH ADDABBO worked. No building can be more properly named than this one.

It is a pleasure and privilege to cosponsor H.R. 4399 and support the naming of the building in Jamaica, Queens, for JOSEPH ADDABBO.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 4399) to designate the Federal building located in Jamaica, Queens, NY, as the Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building.

□ 1030

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for that explanation.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill H.R. 4399; a bill which would designate the Federal Building in Jamaica, Queens, NY, as the "Joseph P. Addabbo Building."

Our dear colleague, who now, unfortunately, is hospitalized at Walter Reed Hospital, has served as a distinguished Member of the House for more than a quarter of a century.

When first elected in November 1960 to the 87th Congress, he was the youngest Democratic Member in Congress to serve under the Kennedy Administration; he now ranks 21 in seniority in the House.

During his tenure in the House, he has served on numerous committees and has chaired the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee since 1979.

Congressman ADDABBO has been a leading advocate for protecting and educating our Nation's youth and has supported numerous bills to prevent child abuse, improve child care services, and Federal aid to elementary, secondary, and urban universities.

In addition, he has worked for continued improvements in Federal programs affecting the health, safety, and welfare of citizens throughout the country.

Born and educated in Queens, NY, in both his public and private life, his work has been dedicated to improving the quality of life for his constituents.

It would be a fitting tribute, if, at this time, we would designate the Federal building in Jamaica, Queens, in his honor.

I would urge my colleagues to support the passage of H.R. 4399.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 4399

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DESIGNATION OF BUILDING.

The Federal building located at Jamaica Avenue and Parsons Boulevard in Jamaica, Queens, in the State of New York, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building".

SEC. 2. LEGAL REFERENCES TO BUILDING.

Any reference in any law, regulation, document, record, map, or other paper of the United States to the building referred to in section 1 is deemed to be a reference to the "Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building".

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on this legislation and to express special tribute to our colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI].

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as the author of H.R. 4399 I am proud that we are moving toward its passage in the House. I warmly commend the esteemed chairman of the Public Works Committee, Mr. HOWARD, for his advocacy of this legislation and commitment to the man it honors, our colleague JOSEPH PATRICK ADDABBO. I am also proud to note that the measure has 81 original cosponsors. I must also note the fact that one of JOE ADDABBO's closest friends in the House, the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. CHAPPELL] was inadvertently omitted from the list of original cosponsors but intended to be.

I introduced this legislation last week as a manifestation of the respect and deep affection I and so many others in this House hold for JOE ADDABBO. We are honoring more than a colleague. We recognize in JOE ADDABBO a quiet greatness that has made his 26-year career in this House so important. JOE has served productively and with great principle since his first election in 1960. The people of Queens have been provided with the highest caliber of service by JOE ADDABBO throughout the years. JOE during his years as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee acquired a national reputation. Yet he does not let the trappings of power cause him to be removed from his constituents. He has served them for so long and so well that they are really part of an extended Addabbo family in Queens. JOE is as good as he is because he mirrors the people he represents in the House. He has unparalleled integrity and an uncompromising commitment to the high moral values and principles.

We are inspired to act today on behalf of a colleague and friend who has inspired so many of us in our careers in the House of Representatives. When we think of JOE ADDABBO, we smile, we feel good because that is how he has made us feel over the years. We talk about a sweet man, kind to all and totally unassuming in his nature and actions.

Without any question, JOE's star shines brightest from his work as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. He tangled with one President over Vietnam, another over Nicaragua. He has taken on the military on their most vulnerable point—waste. He helped to kill funding for the B-1 bomber and to stop procurement of MX missiles. Yet through it all, no matter the level of difference, JOE ADDABBO could disagree without being disagreeable.

As many of my colleagues are aware, JOE admitted last week that he has been waging a 6-year battle with cancer. JOE's nature was such that no one knew. Did he let it slow him down—no. Did he let it get him down—no. JOE ADDABBO loves his life, his work, his country, and the people he represents too much to be any other way. He never wants to burden people with his problems—no matter how serious. That is his nature. That is a measure of the greatness of the man.

JOE has spent almost one-half of his life as a Member of the House of Representatives. He loves this institution and those who serve in it. In turn Members on both sides respect and have genuine affection for JOE. Few serve with greater distinction.

I so fervently hope that this collegial legislative gesture will give him some joy in the knowledge that we who serve with him are thinking of him with love.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIAGGI. I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4399, which names the Federal building in Jamaica, Queens, after our colleague, JOE ADDABBO.

In my years as a Member of this body, and as a life-long resident of a community bordering his congressional district, I have been proud to call Joe a friend and colleague. No one is more deserving of the honor bestowed in H.R. 4399. JOE was respected throughout the Metropolitan New York area for his strong leadership on defense issues and countless other serious matters affecting our region and the Nation as a whole.

The residents of the southwest part of Queens have been fortunate to call JOE ADDABBO their Representative. His tireless support for community development in the Jamaica business district, his efforts on behalf of St. John's Law School, and countless other activities have made JOE's name a household word in his district and in surrounding communities. I can think of no better tribute to JOE's years of service than to name a building in his honor, in the midst of the community he has served with honor and distinction.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4399, a bill to designate the Federal building located in Jamaica, Queens, NY, as the "Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building."

Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of this legislation, I can state unequivocally that this is a small tribute to pay to the Honorable JOSEPH ADDABBO because without his strong persistence, construction of this building would not be a reality today. The building is scheduled to be completed in the fall of this year and will serve as the northeast payment center for the Social Security Administration.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues are aware, JOE ADDABBO was first elected to Congress in 1960 and it has been my privilege to serve with him in the House for 10 years now. To date, he has compiled a legislative record on behalf of all Americans that will be remembered with respect and gratitude. He is a man of incredible integrity and intelligence and is held in high esteem by his colleagues. He enjoys the overwhelming support of his constituents who appreciate his diligence in pressing forward with legislation which has brought about a Veterans' Administration hospital in Queens, a hospital on Ellis Island specializing in drug addiction treatment, improved educational programs, cleanup of the New York Harbor, establishment of the Gateway National Recreation Area, and improved transit for New York. His record in the House is so full of landmarks and achievements and I doubt that the people of New York will ever have a better champion of their interests. He loves his State and he serves its people well.

As chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee since 1979, Congressman ADDABBO has played a significant role in bringing about a strong defense system for our Nation. He has served on the Agriculture and Legislative Subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee, and presently serves on the Treasury-Post Office and Military Construction Subcommittees.

As a former member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, Mr. ADDABBO takes a special interest in the welfare of veterans. He has sponsored numerous bills helping veterans in the areas of education, housing, and employment.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Honorable JOE ADDABBO is not with us today to hear all these accolades due to the fact that he is hospitalized, however, I sincerely look forward to his return to the House.

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in honoring our distinguished colleague, JOE ADDABBO, by passing H.R. 4399, a bill to rename the Federal building in Jamaica, Queens, New York, as the "Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building."

The dedication of this building is a fitting tribute to a man such as JCE ADDABBO, who has so ably represented the people of the Sixth Congressional District of New York. With his 24 years' seniority in the House and his high-ranking position as the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, JOE has a litany of accomplishments to his credit. He has been a voice of moderation in appropriating our defense dollars. Even during the administration's largest ever peacetime increase in defense spending, JOE has shown courage in opposing the executive branch when its plans seem too expensive or too likely to risk war.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that JOE has spoken not only from his own ideology, but also on behalf of his constituency, who have wholeheartedly endorsed his work in the Congress. He has personified the highest standards of personal integrity and unselfish devotion to public service. His constituency has repeatedly sent him back to Washington because of his dedication and leadership capabilities.

When I was elected to the Congress in the fall of 1984, JOE ADDABBO was always available to assist me in any way possible. He was influential in helping me obtain the one vacant Democratic seat on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and also a seat on the Banking Committee. Both these committee assignments are important for the people of my district.

Mr. Speaker, JOE ADDABBO has been a skillful legislator who has always been a good friend and political adviser to me. He has consistently aided those in our society who most need our concern and assistance. It is appropriate that we show our appreciation to JOE by naming a Federal building in his honor. The Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building will serve as a lasting tribute to a man who has given so much of his time and energy toward public service.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 4399, a bill to name the Federal building in Jamaica, NY, as the Joseph P. Addabbo Federal Building. This legislation is a proper and fitting gesture to an outstanding Member of Congress, who tragically lies in a coma as we meet here today in the Chamber he loved so well.

Mr. Speaker, JOE ADDABBO served the people of Queens and the citizens of our great Nation through some momentous times in American history. From the Great Society, to the Vietnam era, on through Watergate, and on to the Reagan years, JOE has been a voice—sometimes a lonely voice, but always a strong and consistent one—of quiet decency that has stood out in this House. As a leader in the fight for a strong but sane military, and as the dean of the New York City delegation, JOE ADDABBO has won the respect and admiration of the U.S. Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the contributions that JOE ADDABBO has made to this Nation and this Congress have been a credit to the people of Queens. Particularly in the field of foreign affairs and military readiness, JOE became an acknowledged leader whose counsel is already sorely missed. From the early 1970's, when he sponsored the first anti-Vietnam war resolution ever to pass this House, to his recent support of a Nicaraguan peace process and opposition to covert military aid to the Contras, JOE consistently challenged our Nation to choose negotiations over weapons; to choose peace, rather than war. JOE has been a staunch opponent of overpriced, untested weapons such as the MX missile, and he has used his position as Chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee to force both Democratic and Republican administrations to look more carefully at our military priorities.

Mr. Speaker, it is particularly appropriate that a building in the community and county JOE so ably represents be named for this exemplary lawmaker and this outstanding American. JOE ADDABBO has spent 25 years fighting for the men, women, and children of Queens. His commitment to his constituents was proven once again as recently as 1984. In that year, party leaders—anticipating a tough election—urged ADDABBO to move to a safe district. JOE ADDABBO responded by staying and fighting it out on his own turf, and prevailed by better than a 2 to 1 margin.

Therefore, I fully support H.R. 4399, a small but important tribute to a truly great Congressman.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO FILE FURTHER CONFERENCE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 534, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, 1986

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight tonight to file a further conference report on House Joint Resolution 534, making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the consideration of the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 540.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT'S REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR NICARAGUAN OPPOSITION

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 722(n) of Public Law 99-83 and the order of the House of March 13, 1986, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 540) relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

The motion was agreed to.

□ 1035

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution, H.J. Res. 540, with Mr. WHITLEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the first reading of the joint resolution is dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to section 722(n) of Public Law 99-83, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] will be recognized for 5 hours and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] will be recognized for 5 hours.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, my colleagues, first I want to say how proud I am to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. JACK MURTHA, as a cosponsor of this legislation.

Both JACK and I are combat veterans of different wars have shed some blood for our country and know full well what war is, and it is hell, whether it be a small war or a big war; and particularly at the foot-slogger level where we have seen it at its worst and with all it gory details.

I mention this only because it has been said from the Speaker on down that our President and those of us who support him in this issue will never be satisfied until we send American boys down to fight in Nicaragua.

Let me put the notion to rest at the very beginning of this debate. That is the last thing good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, JACK MURTHA, and I would ever recommend to our colleagues, and I know the President shares this view.

The bipartisan resolution before us would provide $100 million in aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua; $70 million of that aid, presumably military, will be at the discretion of the President, $30 million of this package will be for humanitarian aid, $3 million of which is specifically earmarked for improvements in human rights.

Now, we are considering this legislation under an expedited procedure that provides for 10 hours of debate and a straight up or down vote.

There will be no opportunity for amendments, so the issue will have to be decided on what we have before us.

Let me now sketch out the nature of the problem in Nicaragua. It did not begin yesterday or just a few years ago. It has its roots deep in the history of Central America.

The poverty and social injustice that have long plagued the region can be traced to cultural and economic causes that go back centuries; but we cannot confuse these issues, important as they may be for understanding the historic background with the urgent problem now confronting us, the Communist takeover of Nicaragua.

Communism does not cure poverty or social injustice. It just makes that condition more available to the masses.

Let us take a quick look back to July 23, 1961, when three Nicaraguans, Carlos Fonseca, Tomas Borge, and Silvio Mayorga, founded the Sandinista National Liberation Front. It was founded, and remains, a classic Leninist vanguard party, what you and I frankly call Communist.

For 17 years the Communist Nicaraguans did not capture a town or threaten Somoza in any real way. They attracted a mere handful of leftist fanatics, and as Lenin put it, "useful idiots." Remember that the next time you hear someone condemn the Contras, for example, as I heard Mr. Tom Wicker the other night on a national program, for never capturing a town in 4 years. The Sandinistas had 17 years. They never captured a town. During the fight against Somoza, the Nicaraguan Sandinistas had to have front groups to hide their true Communist nature. They recruited businessmen, such as Adolfo Colero and others like Arturo Cruz and Alfonso Robelo to join with them as "bourgeois" respectable allies. Colero had been jailed by Somoza. Robelo and Cruz actually became part of the ruling junta; but they, and many others, quickly discovered the true Communist nature of the Sandinistas and had to flee. These three are now the civilian leader of the Contras.

And today we find ourselves wrestling with the problems that the triumph of communism in Nicaragua has caused.

We will be told during the debate that the President's policy in Central America has not worked.

I disagree. It has worked in El Salvador, in Guatemala, in Honduras, where we now have democracies. It can work in Nicaragua if we give it a chance. But all we have done within the last 2 years is tie the President's hands with restrictions and conditions that foreclose that policy from moving forward.

Let me tell you about some policies that really have not worked, policies that came from many of the same ones who now lead the fight against Contra aid.

In 1979, they told us all we needed to do was send aid to the Sandinistas and it would turn them away from the Soviet Union and Cuba. We sent them $118 million right off the bat; but that did not work. The Sandinistas went right ahead putting in place the mechanism of a Communist state, even as we were sending them the aid.

We were told that the Nicaraguan elections in 1984 would be fair and that democracy would be alive and well in Nicaragua.

Why, those elections were a farce. The Communists strengthened their grip.

We were told that if we simply stopped giving aid to the Contras, the Communists would respond by improving human rights.

For well over a year we did not give the Contras one dime, and the reward for that was an increased level of repression by the Sandinista regime; so that did not work.

During this same period, we were told by many of the same people who are against giving Contra aid that the people of El Salvador should accept Communists into their government before elections; but the people of El Salvador said they wanted a real democracy and President Reagan believed them. They have a democratic government now, and let us not forget that we sent not only military assistance, but 55 military advisers to El Salvador to help get that job done at that time; so the argument that democracy could not be achieved by El Salvador was wrong, tragically wrong.

We are now told we must try negotiations without military aid.

Let us cut out the rhetoric and get to the truth about negotiation. The Communists in Nicaragua have consistently refused to enter into talks with the Contras, as we and the Catholic bishops of Nicaragua have asked them to do, and if the Communists do not want to talk with the Contras, no negotiation is worth the paper it is written on.

You can send diplomats to Central America until you are blue in the face and if the Communists feel no pressure to negotiate with their own fellow countrymen, you can forget diplomacy as a means of containing the Communist threat.

As our good friend, Ambassador Philip Habib said—

> I've been dealing with Communists for 25 years. If you send me down there without something in my tool box, the Sandinistas will laugh at me.

Ambassador Habib wants military aid to the Contras.

Either we do it our way or their way. Communists do not understand good intentions. You first have to get their attention, and only the Contras can do that.

One other point. We are told that various Central American and South American governments do not agree with our policies. Well, how many times have I heard them privately tell me the opposite of what I have seen them quoted publicly, and quite frankly, I am not surprised. They have looked at the vacillating, on again, off again policies of the Congress for 6 years and they are hedging their bets. If I were in their place, I might be saying the same things publicly, even if I felt differently.

Let the Contras bring the fight effectively to the Sandinistas and then we will see how these governments react.

If we do not help the Contras, the Communists will have won total victory. Nicaragua will fade from the television news shows. It will disappear from our front pages.

The Communists will quietly begin to settle accounts within Nicaragua, meaning assassinations, concentration camps, total takeover of the churches, the whole savage, destructive strategy of fear that Communists always employ when the world is looking the other way.

Let me finally offer you the definitive argument for aid to the Contras. It is simply a list of countries. It is not a complete list, but it will suffice. Listen to the litany of sorrow:

Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Ukraine, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, East Germany, Romania, Bulgaria, North Korea, Vietnam, Cambodia, Cuba, Angola, Afghanistan.

And you know, once a year we pay lipservice to what we call the captive nations resolution around here. Do we want to add another name to that list? Would it not be better to stop a nation from falling into captivity than to say a few ritual words about them after they become captives?

I have not even mentioned the Communist arms buildup, the denial of human rights on a wide scale, the political prisoners, the terrorist connections, the persecution of the church. I will wait for my colleagues to describe these facts in detail.

I look forward to the debate because it will enable each side ample time to ask questions and hopefully to have those questions answered and answered effectively. But most of all, I look forward to this debate because I believe the bipartisan resolution that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MURTHA] and I are presenting is good for our country, it is good for this hemisphere, and I believe once it gets a fair hearing, eventually our point of view will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] has consumed 9 minutes.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, much of the debate over the President's request for aid to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua revolves around United States objectives for the region. I want to make it perfectly clear from the outset, the United States seeks only a negotiated settlement for a peaceful resolution of the crisis facing Central America. Requesting military assistance for the Contras does not contradict that objective. It is a necessary ingredient in the formula to get the Sandinistas to negotiate. Pressure on the Sandinistas was the catalyst for the Sandinistas to participate in Contadora in the first place. It is needed to pressure them to conclude a comprehensive, enforceable and verifiable agreement.

U.S. policy for Central America has been clear from the beginning of the Reagan administration. Our objectives have been, as the President so clearly stated in his speech before Congress, April 27, 1983:

1. Support for democracy, reform, and human freedom in each country;

2. Renewal of economic development and growth to address the root cause of turmoil and conflict;

3. Security for the democratic governments in Central America; and

4. Support for a political solution to the conflicts in Central America, by way of a peaceful dialog internally and among the countries of the region. This fourth objective is also reflected in the Contadora effort for a regional settlement as outlined in the document of 21 objectives.

In spite of what critics have said, our policy has been working. The advance of democracy in the region has left Nicaragua as the only military dictatorship in Central America.

The United States and the OAS helped the Sandinistas come to power in Nicaragua based, in part, on their promises for democracy, human rights, a mixed economy and nonalignment. Our policy in Nicaragua is based on getting the Sandinistas to live up to those promises. We seek specifically the withdrawal of all foreign military personnel: The Cubans, Bulgarians, Libyans, the PLO and other "internationalists;" we seek a more equitable military balance between Nicaragua and its neighbors; we seek an end to Nicaragua's support for insurgency and subversion in Latin America; and we seek internal reconciliation and democratic pluralism within Nicaragua.

All of these objectives are part of the Contadora negotiations. We seek, just as strongly as the Latin nations and the administration critics, a negotiated solution in Central America. We only ask them: "How do you get the Sandinistas to negotiate?"

I believe the most effective way to get the Sandinistas to conclude an agreement within Contadora is to retain the one reason they have to negotiate: The presence of the democratic resistance in Nicaragua. If the Contras didn't exist, the Sandinistas would have no incentive to come to the bargaining table.

As we debate the President's request for aid to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua, I regret that this has become such a partisan, political issue.

We in this Congress have as our first responsibility defending our Nation. The security of the United States depends on our ability to counter the spread of Marxist-Leninist regimes, whether in Cambodia—14,000 miles away; in Afghanistan—10,000 miles away; or in Nicaragua—900 miles away.

Our security depends as well on our ability to assure our allies that our commitment to their security is just as strong as to our own, whether to the ASEAN nations, to NATO or to the Organization of American States.

In the past, we have responded quickly and decisively against overt threats to our security. Covert threats posed by Communist subversion in Vietnam, Angola, and now in Nicaragua have challenged our country because the Soviets have found that the way to advance their objectives is through disguise and subterfuge. We must not be blind to the Soviet threat in Nicaragua. It is just as real as the threat in Afghanistan.

The National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, and I emphasize the word "bipartisan," unanimously concluded:

The use of Nicaragua as a base for Soviet and Cuban efforts to penetrate the rest of the Central American isthmus, with El Salvador the target of first opportunity, gives the conflict there a major strategic dimension. The direct involvement of aggressive external forces makes it a challenge to the system of hemispheric security, and, quite specifically, to the security interests of the United States. This is a challenge to which the United States must respond.

The Bipartisan Commission on Central America emphasized the crisis in Central America is "nonpartisan, and it calls for a nonpartisan response." Reflecting that spirit, the Commission conclusions have become known as the Jackson plan, after the late Democratic Senator, whose concern for America's security rose above party politics. The Jackson plan concluded that three principles should guide U.S. policy in the region:

First, the first principle is democratic self-determination;

Second, the second principle is encouragement of economic and social development that fairly benefits all; and.

Third, the third principle is cooperation in meeting threats to the security of the region.

Sadly, the Bipartisan Commission concluded:

The present international framework for dealing with challenges to the mutual security of the Americas is weak.

There are those who say we must leave the solution of the crisis in the region to the latins, and that would be appropriate if we were dealing in Nicaragua only with the internal repression of an authoritarian regime. But, adding the Soviet Union's strength to Nicaragua makes the challenge greater than the latins alone can meet. The Jackson plan states:

The Soviet and Cuban threat is real. No nation is immune from terrorism and the threat of armed revolution supported by Moscow and Havana with imported arms and imported ideology.

We believe the democratic resistance in Nicaragua is the only viable means to counter the Sandinista efforts to entrench the Soviet presence on the American mainland. The democratic resistance is also the only reason the Sandinistas need to negotiate. Do not eliminate the only incentive for the Sandinistas to negotiate!

I urge you to vote in favor of the President's request for aid to the democratic resistance and thereby support both the cause of peace in Central America and the security interests of the United States.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 hour to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON], chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence; 1 hour to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] from the Committee on Foreign Affairs; 1 hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN], chairman of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that each of these gentlemen may yield time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY].

Mr. OBEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to rise in opposition to the resolution being presented here today. The question is not whether the Sandinistas are bad. The question is not whether the United States has interests in Central America. It is obvious that the Sandinistas are not the kind of government that Nicaragua needs, and it is obvious that we have interests in the region.

The question is whether or not $100 million in aid to the Contras is going to achieve the laudable goals of the administration. This is not a question of whether we defend or pursue the interests of the United States. It is a question of how. It is not a question of whether we would like to see the Sandinistas out or see them change the way they operate. It is a question of whether or not giving $100 million to a second-rate military operation called the Contras is likely to achieve that goal. I think people who have looked at it clearly feel that the answer is no.

Certainly, $100 million is not enough to topple the Sandinista regime. It is certainly not enough pressure to convert convinced Marxists into reasonable negotiators. It is enough, however, to get the United States into a lot of trouble. It is enough to get the United States on the slippery slope to direct military involvement in Central America.

What happens, I ask my colleagues, if we provide $100 million to the Contras, the Contras then get into a military situation in which they get clobbered, they are in trouble, and they are about to go down. At that point, a number of questions will be raised.

Will we provide logistic support for them at that point? Will we provide additional command and control support for them at that point? What role would our American forces in Honduras and other places then be asked to play?

We have heard a lot from the White House and from proponents of this resolution about the consequences if we do not provide this $100 million. What we ought to ask also is what are the consequences if we do? What comes next?

This obviously is not the last chapter. Pressure is not a policy; it is a tactic. What is that tactic leading to if we approve this? That is the question we ought to ask.

When I have an opinion about an issue and people who are a lot closer to it than I am have a different opinion, I think prudence requires that I take their views into consideration and give their views much more weight than I would have otherwise.

We ought to do that same thing in Central America. The administration says we need to provide $100 million to the Contras to defend El Salvador, to defend Guatemala, to defend Costa Rica, to defend eventually Mexico, but what are those democracies telling us?

The new President of Costa Rica is telling us, "Do not do it." The new President of Guatemala is telling us, "Do not do it." The President of Mexico is telling us, "Do not do it." The new President of the oldest democracy in Central America, Costa Rica, a good ally of ours, has said to us: "If you have an extra $100 million laying around, do not give it to the Contras. It is a waste of money. You will not achieve your goals. What you ought to do if you have an extra $100 million is to give it to the democracies in the region to help them build up their economies and to help them stabilize their social structure so that they are stronger opponents to Marxism from any source, Cuba, Nicaragua, or anywhere else."

We ought to listen to them. We ought to give more than lipservice to negotiating efforts that they are trying to conduct.

The United States of America, with our great tradition, should not be in the business of funding a grinding, low-level, dirty little war under conditions in which, at best, we can play to a tie. We cannot win with $100 million. I think everybody knows that. We should not be conducting or financing a military operation against a country with whom we have diplomatic relations.

I have one other point to make. I have a great deal of regard for the gentleman from Illinois. I think he is one of the class acts in this House. I have tremendous respect for him. I hope people recognize today that if Members want to disagree on the merits, fine; be my guest. That is in the best traditions of this House. But let us not have any attack on people's motives. Let us not have any attack on people's patriotism. This is not an issue of whether we care about this country. All of us care about this country.

The issue is how we think we best defend the interests of the United States. Let us grant that today. Those who do not during this debate will not be bringing shame onto ther opponents; they will be bringing shame onto themselves. I hope that we keep the debate at reasonable levels and I hope that debate adheres to decent standards as we move through a very crucial issue facing this country.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman who just spoke would respond to me on my time?

The gentleman talked about the attitude of Central American leaders. I have in hand here a document which specifically shows where a Latin American high governmental official says privately the United States should support the Contras, although he cannot say it publicly. If the gentleman would care to see this, I would be happy to show it to him. Unfortunately, since the document is classified "Secret" I cannot make it part of the official RECORD.

Would the gentleman like to see this?

Mr. OBEY. If the gentleman will yield, I would be happy to respond to the gentleman by saying when we invaded Grenada, the regional powers signed a statement asking us to do that.

I wonder if the administration could get those regional powers in Central America to sign a similar statement before we proceed with our operation in Nicaragua?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. The gentleman does not want to see this, I presume.

Mr. OBEY. Absolutely. I will see that or anything else the gentleman has.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the Republican leader for yielding this time to me just to make a brief response to the analysis of the situation by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY].

Mr. Chairman, let me say that the one question that this House must consider today was completely ignored by the gentleman's speech that he just made on the floor, and that is, what are we going to do with 12 Hind-D helicopter that have miniguns that fire 3,000 rounds per minute? That is the kind of thing that demoralizes the Contras as well as all of Nicaragua neighbors in Central America.

What are we going to do with the 150 Russian tanks? The gentleman has not considered the very strong possibility of Nicaragua having a devastating military effect on their neighbors and he offers absolutely no solutions to that problem.

That is the problem that I hope that the Members of the House address today. How are we going to confront the Soviet and Cuban presence in Central America?

I think the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MICHEL, made that point very strongly.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, just one other point I think we ought to make in regard to the remarks of the gentleman who just spoke in the well, and that is under the standard enunciated in the well for helping freedom fighters, we would not be able to provide any aid to the Afghan freedom fighters.

It seems to me where valiant people are fighting for their freedom, this Nation does have some responsibility. I do not think we can stand and take the attitude that the gentleman has enunciated in his remarks that there are no freedom fighters anywhere unless they are a first-rate force that has a chance of winning, and that then we help them. Obviously the Afghan freedom fighters would have a real problem actually winning against the Soviets.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I would say he has hit on a very good point. The question is not whether or not the Contras can win militarily. The question is whether or not they can win the more important battle of stopping the Sandinistas from undermining the democratic countries which surround them.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct, and I appreciate the gentleman from Illinois yielding this time.

Mr. MICHEL. I think the gentleman makes a very good point.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. ZSCHAU].

Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Chairman, today and tomorrow, we will be discussing and making a decision on what I consider to be the most critical foreign policy issue that we will be facing this year. In this debate, we will be presenting the information, background on the history of the Central American problems, the facts surrounding the current situation, and most importantly, we will be focusing on the long-term implications of the decision that we make here tomorrow.

We had a similar debate last year about 11 months ago. We talked about whether or not we should provide military assistance to the Contras. At that time, there was an agreement on both sides of the aisle that the Sandinistas were presenting a threat to their neighbors, that they were repressing their own people, and that something had to be done about the problem. The question was: What?

Last year, a proposal was made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] which I cosponsored, that was based on the belief that a military only policy was too narrow and that we ought to pursue diplomatic options as well. The Barnes-Hamilton substitute emphasized diplomacy and pulled back on the military approach. We hoped that it would be an approach that could build a consensus in the Congress and forge ahead in a new diplomatic direction rather than relying totally on a military approach.

The Barnes-Hamilton substitute was defeated by the House, but it provided the intellectual basis for the McDade-Michel amendment which was passed last June to provide $27 million of humanitarian assistance to the Contras in order to keep the democratic opposition alive, to emphasize diplomacy, to provide reports on a regular basis that would determine whether or not the diplomacy was working, and to provide expedited procedures for this request we are considering now. The McDade-Michel amendment was designed to give diplomacy a chance to work. The results have been disappointing and disturbing. The Sandinistas have stopped pretending that they are interested in the Contadora process. They proposed suspending the talks last December. Nicaragua was the only country in the OAS General Assembly to vote against a resolution urging the Contadora process to go forward. They have continued their military buildup with advanced equipment including MI-8 and MI-24 helicopters. They have used Cubans in combat. They have continued to subvert their neighbors. They have clamped down further on their own people with a state of emergency last October, prevented the freedom of worship by the Catholic Church and other religious groups, and perpetrated greater repression in the country. In short, the McDade-Michel approach of diplomacy without military support doesn't work.

So our question this year, 11 months later, is: What do we do now? I suggest that we can receive some guidance from a similar foreign policy decision we made in 1983—the deployment of the cruise and Pershing missiles. It was argued then that if we deployed the cruise and Pershing missiles, the Soviets would walk out of the arms talks and the arms race would be escalated. We were urged not to deploy the missiles because it would upset the Soviets.

There were others then whose wisdom prevailed who said if we give the Soviets what they want without getting anything in return they would have no incentive to negotiate seriously with us.

We deployed the cruise and Pershing. The Soviets walked out of the arms talks, but they are back and they are negotiating. They are proposing the complete elimination of European missiles on both sides—the very same proposal that President Reagan had made originally.

The lesson of that foreign policy decision is that our resolve to be strong and our resolve to be firm, while pursuing constructive negotiations, works. The lesson is that negotiations only succeed if we have the resolve to be strong.

It is exactly the same in the case of Central America. If the Sandinistas believe that they can with impunity subvert their neighbors, repress their own people, increase the military buildup, and ignore the Contadora process, they will do so. We must provide an incentive for them to negotiate in order to make diplomacy work.

The President's request for $100 million would provide the contras with the capability and the confidence to make the Sandinistas realize that their only hope is to pursue the course of diplomacy rather than continuing their subversive and repressive actions.

I have discussed the President's requests with a number of my colleagues. They have asked the following questions:

Is the United States serious about negotiations? If we look at the report accompanying this bill you will find 4 pages; pages 19 to 22, the chronicle of the many efforts that the United States has made on the diplomatic front. Ambassador Philip Habib has just returned from a trip to Central America, and he has reported that those negotiations are continuing.

What are our objectives in Central America. Do we have a plan? Absolutely. Our objectives are: First, to achieve internal reconciliation within Nicaragua, and second, for Nicaragua to stop the threat that they pose to their neighbors. These objectives are not just our objectives. They are objectives of the neighboring Central American countries.

Do we have a right to insist that there internal dialog in Nicaragua? Absolutely yes. That government came into power based on a pledge to the Organization of American States that they would have free and fair elections. Had we been told that they were going to implement a Cuban-style Communist state, they would not have gotten the support of the OAS. All we are asking is that the Government of Nicaragua live up to that original pledge.

Why are the other Central American countries not supporting our aid for the Contras? They are. Those countries understand the need for pressure in order to make the negotiating process work. President Duarte of El Salvador has said that the Contras provide a necessary and effective barrier to the threat that the Sandinistas pose to his country.

As the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished minority leader, indicated earlier, the other Central American nations can't afford to be out in front and support our policy when they might then find that our lack of commitment pulls the rug out from under them.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY] asked the question: Can this policy be successful? There is no guarantee that this program will be successful. But I can guarantee that if we do not pursue the support of the Contras at this time, the result will be certain and far more tragic. If we do not continue the pressure on the Sandinistas to make the negotiating process work, the Sandinistas will crush their internal opposition, consolidate a Soviet-Cuban supported totalitarian state, and provide a Soviet base on the Isthmus of Central America threatening not only their neighbors, but also the Western Hemisphere.

As we pursue this debate, let me suggest that we ask ourselves: What is the outlook for Nicaragua and the Nicaraguan people if we do not support the President's request to keep the pressure on? What is the outlook for Central America if we do not support the President's request? Have we not learned our lesson that we need to be strong and we need to use incentives in order to make diplomacy work?

Last year, we agreed that the Sandinistas present a problem to our Central American neighbors. Last year we agreed that we wanted to give diplomacy a chance to work.

This year we should agree also that diplomacy in Central America will work only if the Sandinistas realize that their approach to repressing their own people and threatening their neighbors will not succeed. The Sandinistas must realize that, with the support of the American people, the democratic opposition is a credible force and, therefore, negotiations toward internal reconciliation and a peaceful settlement in the region is their best hope.

I urge all of my colleagues who want to see a diplomatic solution in Central America to support the President's request for the $100 million of assistance to the Contras.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZSCHAU. I am happy to yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I would just simply like to tell the gentleman how pleased I am that you have decided to vote with us on this particular issue, and I hope that many other Members who have taken a different position in the past like you will listen carefully to the arguments which you have presented, and that you will help to influence some of those because I think that the margin of victory tomorrow when we cast our vote will be by people like yourself who have had some questions in the past, who are willing to move forward in terms of providing this particular aid at this time. I hope that it will not be just limited to this aid, because I have a feeling we are going to need it for a very long time. Those of us from the State of California clearly recognize, as we see the inflow of refugees coming up through our borders, how important it is to provide this aid to the Contras in order to help establish democracy in Nicaragua.

I would like to thank you for the vote that you will cast and work aggressively with you on the floor to make certain that your switched vote is not the only one, but there are others besides yours that we can count on.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, how much time have we consumed on this side of the aisle?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] consumed 23 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. ZSCHAU] consumed 11 minutes.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS].

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, before I discuss the merits of this policy issue, I want to say a few words about the smear campaign that was launched by the Subcommunicator of the White House, Mr. Buchanan.

First I want to say that the gentleman from Illinois, BOB MICHEL, the minority leader, has a distinguished record both in the Congress and in the military, and I do not believe he would question the motives of any other Member of this body in taking a stand in any debate in this body. I especially want to single out my neighbor to the north in Indianapolis, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON]. You will not find a stronger advocate for the President's position than that of DAN BURTON of Indiana, and you will not find Mr. BURTON of Indiana casting aspersions upon the loyalty or the patriotism of any Member of this body.

But I hear it said from Mr. Buchanan, whose biography says he was a sincere admirer of Joseph McCarthy—I suppose there is not much question about that anymore—I hear it said that those who think U.S. Military involvement in what General McArthur might have called the quicksands of Latin America, favor communism, favor the Sandinista government. It might be fair to ask what about our President who at one time was a strong supporter of the Contras in China, the Nationalist Chinese. Is the fact that our President has abandoned the Contras in the sense of their military struggle to overthrow the Communist government in China, does that mean that President Reagan is in sympathy with communism in China? Is the fact that President Reagan lobbied Congress to pass a law that allows American firms, including his former employer, General Electric, to sell nuclear technology to the Communist government in China, does that mean that President Reagan is in sympathy with the Communists in China?

This Member cast a vote against that law. I think it is unwise; but this Member is not saying that President Reagan is disloyal. What about the Contras in Cuba? Here is Nicaragua in our backyard, about 1,000 miles; here is Cuba in our frontyard, about 90 miles. Here is Cuba for 25 years trying to export revolution to Latin America and South America. Here is Cuba; much stronger, much bigger, much more established than the Nicaragua Communists—getting nowhere fast in Latin America, except in the case of Somoza for whom Nicaraguans were willing to exchange anyone.

Now, why is President Reagan not supporting the Contras in Cuba? Much stronger military power. I have an idea that even though they are much stronger than the Communists in Nicaragua, they are still not strong enough even to get our Marine Corps base to leave their own country.

You may remember that cartoon, speaking of the Subcommunicator at the White House—you remember that cartoon of Mauldin's, where a fellow is walking down the street in France with his fists doubled up, Willie saying to Joe: "He ain't no combat man, he's lookin' for a fight."

Some people have said "war wimps"; some people have said even "warrior voyeurs"; some people have said "stateside bugle blowers," but this whole thing has brought out the poet in me, and I have paraphrased that famous verse from Judson Haggerty of Indianapolis.

It talks a good fight,
This bird from the right,
But won't raise a feather to help
When they go o'er the sea
He has a bad knee
And can only stay home and yelp.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will read two quotations for you. One, on October 21, 1964:

> We are not about to send American boys 9,000 or 10,000 miles away from home to do what Asian boys ought to be doing for themselves.—President Lyndon Johnson

July 20, 1966:

> More manpower will be required. • • • On the military front our troops under General Westmoreland are giving an excellent account of themselves. • • • We shall persist.

We shall send General Westmoreland such men as he shall require and request.

Here we go again. Gulf of Tonkin Day.

They say if you want to find out what a cowboy will do when he gets drunk, you find out what he did the last time he got drunk.

We ought to know by now that when they send the guns, it does not take long before they send the sons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. In the past century and a half our country, our beloved country, has invaded Central-Latin America a total of 60 times, according to the U.S. News & World Report.

At the occasion of the Bay of Pigs invasion in Cuba, President Reagan and other colleagues of his called—I do not want to say that President Reagan specifically said that John F. Kennedy was a coward, but it was the general line of the right in this country that John F. Kennedy was a coward; John F. Kennedy, disabled in World War II in battle, was a coward, they insisted, because he did not send American troops to back up the Contras in Cuba when they were failing.

Well, if they criticized President Kennedy for not sending in troops to back up the Contras when they failed in Cuba, what do you suppose they will do themselves when these Somoza Contras fail in Nicaragua?

Mr. DORNAN of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DORNAN of California. The gentleman has a combat record in Korea second to none in this House, and we respect his point of view over here, and I would like to make the gentleman privy to our counsels over here on this debate today—not once, at the moment of highest frustration, have I ever heard one Member of my party disparage the patriotism of any single member of your great party that is in the majority in this House.

We respect those viewpoints. There has been a lot of passion on the outside, but the collegiality we hold together in this House, I have never heard it breached.

Mr. JACOBS. I thank the gentleman for his statement, I acknowledge what he says, I admire the gentleman because I do not know anybody who is more sincere in his position; it is an honest disagreement between the two of us. I do not know anybody who is more honest in his position and in those heavy emotions who has, I assume, not even been tempted to impugn the loyalty of any other Member, and I repeat my admiration for the decency of my colleague to the north in Indianapolis, Mr. BURTON, in whose district, by the way, I receive my mail, because my mailbox is across the road.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MCCLOSKEY].

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong opposition to the request for $100 million in military and other aid to the Contra guerrillas.

One does not have to be sympathetic to the increasingly repressive Sandinista-Marxist regime to realize the primary issue on this vote is not whether or not one is opposed to that regime. We all lament its failures. The question is what is wise policy given our own diplomatic and security interests. Decent respect for the opinions of mankind and the lives and safety of untold thousands of people, largely innocent of the greater struggle, should also weigh heavily with us.

This package is hardly necessary for our diplomatic or security interests. It offends numerous allies, particularly in Latin America and Europe, and undercuts the Contradora process. This military aid request does not promise peace but only protracted military involvement and death, injury, disfigurement, and dismemberment of untold thousands. We should stand with the U.S. Catholic Conference and the Society of Jesus in rejecting this unwise package and more vigorously pursue a just peace.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. Why would not we stand with the cardinal of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua who is very firmly opposed to that which is going on within his own country, and believes that we need to have a democratic resistance within that country?

Why would the gentleman mention the groups that he did and not suggest that we ought to stand with Cardinal Obando y Bravo.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I would tell the worthy gentleman from Pennsylvania that in any broad, diverse and to some degree pluralistic group there is going to be a difference of opinion on these issues; indeed as is the case on both sides of the House floor today.

The simple fact is that there is strong religious community sentiment, particularly in the United States; Catholic, Evangelical, and otherwise, including very definite and detailed statements from the Society of Jesus and the U.S. Catholic Conference who have contacted my office. The cardinal has not. They sincerely hold that viewpoint.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Yes, I will.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman.

Is the gentleman aware that 95 percent of all the nuns and priests in the Catholic Church in Nicaragua stand with the cardinal?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I am not aware of that particular figure, and I would question its source.

Mr. WALKER. Well, if the gentleman will yield, it is the cardinal who told us that.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I am sure that is the cardinal's worthy view, but I have received dozens of reports otherwise from Maryknoll priests and nuns visiting Indiana, coming back from Central America. So I would say opinion on that is mixed.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no requests for time at present, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILLIS].

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, President Reagan's request for $100 million from the present defense budget in military and humanitarian assistance to Contra forces in Nicaragua is undoubtedly one of the most controversial requests which an American President has made during the last decade. The decision which this Congress makes on House Joint Resolution 540 will have great political and military repercussions during this and forthcoming generations.

It is not coincidental that one of the most important military decisions reached by any President in the second half of this century involved this same area of the world. The action which President John F. Kennedy took to contain what he determined to be an unacceptable risk to the security of this hemisphere stands as one of the most courageous acts which a modern President has ever taken. President Kennedy's convictions and courage set the tone for foreign policy decisions made by the United States and the Soviet Union for much of the cold war era. His decisiveness and willingness to confront and deal with the unacceptable has been hailed by historians as an historical turning point, and rightly so. It put an end to one grave Soviet intervention in our hemisphere.

President Reagan's request for Contra assistance bears many of the same characteristics of this earlier decision. It will also set the tone for our foreign policy for the coming decade. It is in essence a confrontation of the superpowers—1980's style. It is not as dramatic or perhaps as clearly defined as our earlier confrontation over Cuban missiles; but nevertheless it deals with and involves a long-term threat to our hemisphere. My colleagues, make no mistake about it: The Soviet Union is following the action which we will take in this Congress just as closely as it followed the responses taken by President Kennedy and our Government in 1962.

Once again, the U.S.S.R. is attempting to establish a Soviet center of influence on the mainland of the Americas where it can by proxy, create and support subversion in Central and South American countries. It is an old and familiar pattern. If the Soviets are successful in this threat, they will directly affect the stability and integrity of a number of fragile regional democracies, some of which with our encouragement have very recent beginnings. Ten years ago less than one-third of Latin American people lived under democratic governments; now this figure is over 90 percent. Are we willing to expose these people to the risks of Daniel Ortega's subversive government?

It is no secret that Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega has invited a substantial number of subversive groups to use his country as a base for their future operations. These groups include 200 Soviet and 7,500 Cuban advisors. There are also advisors from East Germany, Bulgaria, and Libya. And these are just for openers. Joining in the broad effort to solidify a Communist beachhead in Nicaragua are agitators. From the PLO, Basqueeta terrorists, the German Baader-Meinhoff Gang, the Argentine Montoneros, and the Italian Red Brigades. The effect which activities supported by the Sandinistas have had is already evident. They include a continuing number of subversive actions in El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Colombia. It is their every intention that Marxism be on the march throughout the Americas.

We must convince Daniel Ortega and his Soviet sponsors that we will not allow this to continue. He must be convinced to include democratic elements in his government.

□ 1120

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIS. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KASICH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman makes a very important point. We had a speaker here not long ago who talked about the fact that the Cubans have been trying to foment revolution throughout Central America. But would the gentleman agree that we have got Cubans present in Nicaragua, we have Cubans fighting in Angola, Cubans fighting in Ethiopia? So there is a very high price to pay when the Soviets dump the kind of money and support into Nicaragua that they have dumped into Cuba. What the gentleman points out is the overwhelming support from the Soviet bloc people.

Does not the gentleman believe that with that kind of tremendous support of the Soviet bloc that there is a price to pay on the part of Nicaragua in terms of taking orders from the Soviet Union just like the Cubans have in sending their people to Angola and Ethiopia and Nicaragua to be the vanguard of the Soviet Union?

Mr. HILLIS. That is very true, and I appreciate the contribution of the gentleman on that point.

I want to proceed by saying that not surprisingly, in another area, the Sandinista record on human rights has not been encouraging. Since the Cubans arrived in 1979 we have witnessed the steady erosion of basic human and civil rights—in essence, exchanging a rightwing dictatorship for a leftwing dictatorship. Since then censorship has been imposed, elections postponed, an opposition leader murdered, and Indian villages burned. The Pope was insulted at the same time that church leaders were being attacked. After a dubious election, general civil rights were suspended. It can only be imagined what the future human rights policy of Daniel Ortega will be if the Contras are defeated.

Our Government has encouraged President Ortega to comply with his government's stated objective in 1979—the creation of democratic government. We supported Nicaragua with foreign assistance after the overthrow of Somoza. After over 6 years it has become clear that Daniel Ortega will only include democratic elements in his government if military actions by the Contras force him to do so.

The Contras cannot do this without our help. Since 1981 Nicaragua has received more than half a billion dollars of Soviet military assistance. In the period between mid-1984 and early 1985 the number of tanks and armored personnel carriers increased from 240 to more than 340. Large numbers of artillery have been added to Nicaragua's arsenal, including 24 Howitzers which can fire a 96-pound shell almost 11 miles. Support units consisting of a multitude of trucks and other vehicles have been given to the Sandinistas. In addition, an advanced radar air defense system has been installed, as well as a number of airfield facilities. Nicaragua recently received from five to eight MI-24/HINK D attack helicopters. These "flying tanks" are equipped with a nose-mounted Gatling-type machinegun and can carry 130 57-millimeter rockets. This helicopter, used by the Soviets in Afghanistan, is one of the most advanced in the world. It has had a devastating effect on Contras forces. During this period the United States has only provided minimal amounts of humanitarian assistance. You cannot win a war against MI-24/HIND D attack helicopters with humanitarian assistance.

Our objective must be to support the efforts of the Contras to include democratic elements in the Nicaraguan Government. There has never been a single instance in history where a Communist government has become democratic peacefully. The effect of any delay in providing American assistance will only be greater bloodshed, and perhaps the loss of the best opportunity there is for the establishment of a democratic government.

In closing, it is frequently claimed that our approval of $100 million of assistance to the Contras will lead us into a Vietnam style conflict. As a long-time member of the House Armed Services Committee, who has witnessed the continuing legacy of this conflict, I can assure you that I would not favor approval of the President's request if I felt that this would occur.

I would rather suggest that if the Contras are not successful in persuading President Ortega to include democratic elements in his government that the resulting consolidation of Sandinista power will result in a powerful destabilizing force in Central and South America. The importance which this could have to democracies in our hemisphere cannot be overemphasized. Given time, this could lead to a number of regional conflicts which the United States could not ignore, with consequences far greater than that of Vietnam.

I thus urge you to support House Joint Resolution 540.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIS. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to rise and compliment the gentleman for his outstanding statement. He is a very important member of the Committee on Armed Services. I just hope the Members listened very carefully to what he had to say. I think it has been very helpful.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIS. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Ms. FIEDLER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman trying to tell us that the tools of negotiation are not helicopters, guns, and other weapons which are coming in in massive numbers into Nicaragua, that the gentleman does not believe that those weapons are coming into that country for the good of creating a peaceful environment there?

Mr. HILLIS. To answer the gentlewoman, of course they are not. They are brought in not only to protect the Sandinista government but I think to export the march of communism throughout the Americas, there can be no question about it.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. McKINNEY].

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is very interesting for me to be standing on this side of the floor for the first time in 16 years. It is amazing to me that they say the mark of a true democracy is the civility with which we conduct our disagreements.

I disagree with the President of the United States on his request for aid to the Contras.

Where is Nicaragua going to expand? Is it going to expand to Honduras with $30 million worth of American fortifications? Is it going to expand to the south into Costa Rica, one of the greatest free nations of Central America, and irritate all of Central and South America as well as the Western World? Or is a nation not quite the size of New York State, going to attack the United States? It is not.

What makes communism is really the basis of this argument. What does make communism?

You know, we argued in this place about the Panama Canal for most of my first 10 years here. The Panama Canal was like a sore to most Central Americans and we made it a bigger and bigger sore.

Now every time some radical kook, some Daniel Ortega, some person of that ilk stands up and says, "Look at the United States," he seems to be proven right by our very actions.

It is wrong not to exhaust all diplomatic channels before exercising a military option. We are, by our actions, by our statements, and by our movements, making more Communists in Central and South America than Mr. Ortega can possibly make.

We also are being distracted from bigger problems. I happen to love Mexico. I think it is a beautiful, beautiful country, but it has monstrously big economic and internal problems, and we are being distracted from those problems.

Then I have to ask myself who am I being asked to back? Who?

The three gentleman that used to be with that great Nicaraguan by the name of Mr. Somoza that visited my office? I am told that these are freedom fighters. Freedom for who? The Contras do not have the popular support of the Nicaraguan people. Who elected them? And who do they represent?

Mr. DeLAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKINNEY. No, I will not yield. It has been a very difficult debate.

Mr. DeLAY. Would the gentleman name the three gentlemen?

Mr. McKINNEY. I do not remember the names.

Mr. Cruz, I think, was one of them.

Let us leave it simply by saying, whether they were anti-Somoza or pro-Somoza, why eight months before the downfall of Mr. Somoza were we not so interested in overthrowing him as we are Mr. Ortega? Mr. Chairman, my time unfortunately has expired.

As I say, civility of disagreement is a great part of democracy.

Thank you.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. WISE. I thank the Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, after much examination and reexamination, because each year this question comes up, each year we have to ask where we have been and where we are going; each Member I know goes through the same process.

But I have come to the conclusion that it would be wrong to support the President's request to give $100 million of which $70 million would be direct military aid to the Contras. I arrive at that decision with several of the following facts and reasonings: First, that our allies in the region themselves have opposed this U.S. military aid to the Contras; not only the four Contadora nations but four other nations in the region have urged rejection. And I know the arguments are made that there is private acceptance of it even though there is public rejection. Yet I have not heard any of that private acceptance.

Indeed, all I have seen is the President of Costa Rica saying—I will not yield at this time. I am well aware of the letter of the gentleman. Thank you very much. But as I say, I will not yield; what I have heard instead is from the President of Costa Rica that "If you have $100 million, there is a lot more use to put it to than giving it to the Contras."

I look at the fact that the Contras have simply not proven to be an effective fighting force, perhaps because they have not gotten the material they need, some would argue, but I have to look at the fact that during the Somoza regime 6,000 guerrillas, some Sandinistas, some from a wider base, overthrew an unpopular regime. I look today at 1986 and I see 15,000 to 20,000 guerrillas not able to do so, indeed for the most part cannot operate within the country. Why is that? I have to conclude that it is lack of popular support, not that the Nicaraguan people are endorsing the Sandinistas by any extent but they are also saying we do not see the Contras as an acceptable or viable alternative.

Finally, I do not see that the administration has identified a clear purpose for this aid. They say the argument initially was to stop the flow of arms sales to El Salvador. That is no longer the argument. The argument now is that we need to pressure for democratic reforms. And then finally the reason is given that the national security of the United States is threatened.

Ladies and gentlemen, make no mistake about it, if the national security of this country is threatened, if indeed there is a Soviet menace in Nicaragua, then this country will have to take its own steps to deal with that. It cannot depend upon rented guerrillas.

Ladies and gentlemen, that is an important question here. To what extent is there Soviet interference? If there is Soviet involvement, if there is Soviet military equipment being placed, then once again we cannot depend on others to take care of that situation for us.

One thing that goes ignored is that the President's request asks for more than money. The President's request would lift the prohibition against using American military advisers to work with Contra units. And so we begin to walk down that road.

Finally, I ask, what is the barometer about which we say the Sandinistas are worse than someone else? Is it dictatorship? Is it repression? Is it the fact they brutalize the Miskito Indians, which they have? I would suggest that there are many other nations that we need to be applying that criteria to.

Mr. Chairman, I urge rejection of this request.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

If the gentleman who just spoke will stay down here, I would like to pose just one question.

The gentleman says that he is not aware of any of the private assurances by the leaders in Central America that they do wish to continue this pressure on the Sandinistas. I wonder if the gentleman could inform the House which Presidents of which Central American countries he has met privately with and discussed that matter.

Mr. WISE. If the gentleman will yield for a response, I did not meet privately with officials like that. All I can go by is what I see and what I hear, and also the representations that are made by those representatives.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman I have met personally and privately with the Presidents of most of the countries down there repeatedly, and for the gentleman to say he is not aware of these private assurances, it would be very easy to get them if the gentleman would make himself available to listen to those arguments.

Mr. WISE. What about the President of Mexico? What about the President of Costa Rica, for instance, for two?

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman spoken privately to either of those gentlemen?

Mr. WISE. Are they saying something to the rest of the world?

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Of course, would not the gentleman? With the biggest military force in Central American history right next to you, would the gentleman say publicly, "Go get them, guys"?

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, with whom has the gentleman spoken and will the gentleman make that available?

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Yes. Here it is, right here.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank my Republican leader.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to respond to two speakers ago, the distinguished gentleman from our party from Connecticut [Mr. MCKINNEY].

Those three people that Mr. MCKINNEY spoke about, coming to his office, two of them I asked to visit with STU. I do not think the gentleman is aware that those three gentlemen always fought Somoza; not "eventually," as Mr. MCKINNEY stated. They were in the forefront of both the business and government sectors, in leadership roles against Mr. Somoza. Two of them went to prison for their Somoza opposition. Be accurate, my colleagues, please don't do what PBS did last night.

Point No. 2, the gentleman from Connecticut referred to Daniel Ortega, the Communist head of state, as a "radical kook." He may be a radical Communist but he is not a kook. On our side there may be a temptation to talk about Ortega's $3,500 purchase in New York of bulletproof designer glasses and his weird teaming with Donohue on the "Phil Donahue Show, but I hope Members resist trivializing these hard-core Communists." Mr. Ortega is a deadly serious Communist who with his eight fellow totalitarian commandantes has control of the Government in Nicaragua. Ortega did not travel to Prime Minister Olof Palme's funeral as a radical kook. He went as the head of state of a Communist government, a hero behind the iron curtain.

He may have been a bank robber, and milk truck high jacker shooting up innocent truck drivers—two are still paralyzed—and he may never have heard a gun shot in anger against the Somoza regime in the hills or the villages, but he is a deadly serious leader of a sad tiny country that is a terrorist supporting malignancy in our hemisphere.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the Contra aid package currently before us.

Why should we spend $100 million—dollars needed so desperately in our country—to carry out a failing policy. The administration cannot even tell the Congress how supporting this package will translate into the desired goal of a democratic Nicaragua.

There are various reasons Members have for supporting Contra aid. I would like to pose some of these reasons.

Are you supporting this package because you want to see the Sandinista government overthrown?

If you are, then you better be ready to back up the President when he sends in the U.S. Marines, because that is the logical outcome of this policy. Nobody believes that the Contras can win, no matter how much aid we lavish upon them. And by removing the important prohibition on CIA or Defense Department involvement, this particular proposal raises the specter of American advisers working side by side with the Contras. American advisers have already been mentioned by the administration. This image should be frighteningly familiar to all those who clearly remember how our involvement began in Vietnam.

Are you supporting this package because you think it will cause the Sandinistas to stop their military buildup, remove restrictions on civil liberties, and send home all their foreign advisers?

A simple dose of logic should dispel this belief. National reconciliation is achieved by diplomacy, not by guns. As long as we continue to aid the Contras, the Sandinistas have an excuse to rely on Soviet aid and restrict civil liberties. If anything, the policy of aiding the Contras has been counterproductive. Negotiation is the only realistic way that we have of achieving these worthy goals.

I am not alone in this conviction. Last month, the foreign ministers of the countries most involved in trying to curb Nicaragua's abuses—the Contadora countries and the Contadora support group—unanimously asked the President to stop aiding the Contras and to work for a negotiated settlement.

Are you planning to vote for this proposal because you believe that the Contras are democratic-loving freedom fighters like our Founding Fathers?

If this is the case, then I think you do our founders a grave disservice. The Contras are not freedom fighters; they are terrorists who carry out indiscriminate attacks on civilians. The Sandinistas are certainly not my idea of a model democracy. That's for sure. But they do have real and legitimate opposition in their own country. In the last election, members of the opposition won 36 seats; the church is not happy with their attitude and policies and makes its opposition known. But the Nicaraguan people are not fooled; they know that a Contra victory will likely result in a government run by such former Somocistas as Ricardo Lau, the man accused of plotting the assassination of Archibishop Romero of El Salvador, or Armando Lopez, former head of the Managua police forces at a time when that organization was criticized by international human rights groups for committing torture and assassinations. The Nicaraguan people do not believe that the Contras are freedom fighters. Why should they support the Contras and bring back a regime that violated their human and economic rights for so many years under Somoza?

It's hard to believe the President could call himself a Contra when recent documented reports have concluded that a major cocaine smuggling ring in the San Francisco Bay Area netted over $500,000 for Contra groups in Costa Rica. One of those convicted for smuggling stated that proceeds from the cocaine, "belonged to * * * the Contra revolution." President Reagan said in his television address that "every American parent concerned about the drug problem will be outraged to learn that top Nicaraguan officials are deeply involved in drug trafficking." I agree with him. Let us not give hard-earned American tax dollars to any drug smugglers, and the Contras are documented drug smugglers.

Finally, are you planning to vote yes on this proposal because you feel that the President deserves our support on all foreign policy issues and that on these issues we must be united?

In that case, you are sanctioning one of the most vicious smear campaigns since the days of Joseph McCarthy. President Reagan and his henchman Pat Buchanan seek to portray anyone who votes against their wishes as anti-American.

In conclusion, I ask you, Mr. President, where are the negotiations that you promised us last year? Where is the commitment to Contadora that we hear about so often? Now we have Phillip Habib riding to the rescue. Where was Phillip Habib 6 months ago? Where was he when the Sandinistas offered to sign the Contadora accord in 1984? Maybe they were bluffing but we never even found out.

I could go on and on. Let me end by saying that if you vote for this package, you vote to throw $100 million down a bottomless hole; instead, we could spend it on our farmers, our homeless, our kids; you vote for the strong possibility of United States troops in Nicaragua—certainly American advisers right away; you vote against the advice of all of our friends in the region; and you vote for an administration that will do anything, including impugn the motives of Members of Congress, to get what it wants.

If we learned anything from the Philippines, it is that all the guns in the world cannot win over a people ready for democracy. Let us lead the fight for democracy in Nicaragua, not for continued bloodshed and killing.

□ 1145

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is interesting that a number of people on the other side are saying that the Contras cannot possibly win. And I simply wonder what would have happened if we had not believed that Corazon Aquino could win. And I think there are very few Members in this House who think that Cory Aquino could have won in the Philippines had the military not ultimately backed her.

Negotiations, good wishes, good will could not have helped her win. But ultimately the military went with her, and that allowed her to win.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I have a short statement to make. I did not ask the gentlewoman to yield.

Let me go, very briefly, to the drug question.

The gentlewoman has spoken of a Federal court case in which a newspaper alleges that there are sealed files that say that somebody who was caught with dope said, I was getting this dope for the Contras, which I think is a pretty self-serving statement.

Let us go to some documented evidence that came out of hearings in the U.S. Congress. That documented evidence was to the effect—and this came from former Sandinista diplomat, Antonio Farach, that FSLN Minister of Defense, one of the commandantes, 1 of the 9 Somozas who now run Nicaragua, Humberto Ortega, "was directly involved in trafficking of narcotics. International traffickers were offered use of Nicaraguan landing strips and facilities, and international travel documentation issued by the Nicaraguan Office of Immigration. The Sandinistas justified involvement in the drug trade because it was destined for"—in the words of high-ranking communist officials in Nicaragua—"the youth of the United States, the youth of our enemies. The drugs were used as a political weapon because in that way we were delivering a blow to our principal enemy."

So I would say to the gentlewoman that if she is trying to make a comparison between this story that comes from sealed evidence, that comes from the triple hearsay that says that the guy who was caught says he was going to give the money to the Contras, if you want to compare that to the documented evidence that says that drug trafficking is an official policy of the Communist government in Nicaragua, you lose.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I want to tell the gentleman that I certainly agree with what he said and add to it that Mr. Alvaro Baldizon, who was a high official in the Interior Ministry serving under Tomas Borge, described in a hearing here last week meetings he had with officials of the Ministry of Interior where they did confirm it was their policy, after he found out about it, and for two reasons, one, to raise money to finance espionage, and so on, and, second, as the gentleman has pointed out, as a direct arm and a direct threat against us. Official policy.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me on that point?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, he also said that not only was Tomas Borge involved directly, but so was Humberto Ortega, the Defense Minister and, of course, the brother of Daniel Ortega, both of whom are part of the nine-member directorate of Sandinistas who actually run that country. And he pointed out that at one of the meetings where they discussed this, there was a Cuban official who sat there and confirmed what they were doing and approved of it as official policy.

The Secretary of State has made it absolutely clear to the leaders of the Democratic resistance that the United States will not give any financial assistance to anyone involved in drug trafficking.

CIA and DEA confirm they have no information whatever to link the leadership or the membership of the F.D.N. to drug trafficking.

The one known case of drug trafficking occurred in the group fighting in the Southern part of Nicaragua and is not receiving any United States assistance.

The DEA confirms that the case referred to by Congresswoman BOXER involved a Nicaraguan, Enrique Zavallos, who was a member of a Colombian drug ring. The DEA further confirms that the individual Enrique Zavallos later admitted to having lied about any connection with the Contras in Nicaragua, that he had only made up that story.

Mr. HUNTER. I think it is important that we follow this up.

Mr. Robelo is present in the Capitol today, one of the leaders, who, I am sure, everybody in this body feels to be a very decent person, a former Sandinista. And I would offer to every Member of this body who has a question, if there have been people involved in the Contra movement at lower levels, concededly by the other side, who have been involved in any drug smuggling whatsoever, I would ask any Member of this body to meet with Mr. Robelo—he is here this very minute—and find out what action he is taking with regard to this matter. And I think that most Members of this body will agree he is a decent person, he is against any involvement in narcotics. It is not their official policy. He will take swift and sure action. And that contrasts with the official policy of smuggling heroin and cocaine, destined for the veins of our children that exists with the Ortega brothers and the other commandantes in Managua.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. I thank the chairman very much, because I was not able to get into the discussion, which I think was important, because let me just tell my good friend and colleague from California that the case that I am referring to is a documented case not disputed by the U.S. attorney. It was picked up by the national press. It is documented as to the various Contra connections. And I think the point is here, I say to my colleagues, that we are not here debating giving money to the Sandinistas. I would not give any money to the Sandinistas. We are here debating giving money to the Contras. And before we give all this hard-earned taxpaper dollars, I think we need to know the truth. Maybe some people do not want to face the truth. And that is what this debate is about. The truth is the biggest drug bust in the west coast history took place in the bay area and involved a direct connection with the Contras. You do not like it, but you better hear it because it is documented and it is true.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the gentlewoman claim that Mr. Robelo was involved?

Mrs. BOXER. The gentleman did not yield to me, and I would like to finish my statement.

The gentleman made a point about Cory Aquino. If we learned anything from the Philippines, it is that all the guns in the world cannot win over a people who are ready for democracy.

So I think that we can fight for democracy in Nicaragua, and we should fight for democracy in Nicaragua, but we should not vote for bloodshed and killing. That is not what brought democracy to the Philippines, my friend. What brought it was the people yearning for democracy. And all of the guns in the world cannot stop that.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of Contra aid. In my opinion, this is not a partisan political vote, and each Member will have to make up their own mind.

If the President wants this responsibility, we should give it to him. Five hundred and thirty-five of us just cannot make foreign policy decisions.

This has to be done by the President of the United States. He says he needs $100 million to help bring democracy and stability to that part of the world. I am going to vote to give him that opportunity.

I do not know whether the aid will work or not. I do know that negotiations for 6 years have not worked. However, I think we should continue to negotiate, but also if the President, as our Commander in Chief, says he needs this military aid, I think that we should vote tomorrow and let him have it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, last month, in February, I was in Honduras and Guatemala, and I had the opportunity to meet with legislators in those two countries who had just been elected the first time. They were so proud that they now have democracies in Honduras and Guatemala and that they were elected by the people. We talked to them and they told us they were very, very concerned about what was taking place in Nicaragua. They are not going to get on the streets and shout this, but they told us that they support what the United States is trying to do to slow down communism in Nicaragua, and they were worried that communism could spread into their countries.

The picture of freedom in Central America is really looking good, other than Nicaragua. When you look at the new democracies of El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala, and then you say, "How can we help them?" Well, the President has told us how we can help. He wants this $100 million.

I would like to close just by saying that I think we should do everything possible that we can to help those young democracies; and we have to do everything possible that we can to slow down communism wherever we can.

So I certainly support Contra aid. I think it is a correct way to go.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS].

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, later in the debate I will have an opportunity as a member of the Armed Services Committee to debate this matter more extensively. But during the time that I have here, I would like to make two points.

First, there has been a great deal of focus on the issue of communism, an idea. The point that I have always tried to make is that if you oppose an idea, how do you best challenge that idea? With a bigger bomb or bigger bullet or aid to the Contras? Or do you fight it with a better idea?

I choose to believe that you must fight an idea with which you disagree with a better idea.

Now, let us look at what our better idea is ostensibly all about: Commitment to democracy and constitutional law. The Constitution states that the Congress of the United States shall have the right to declare war. We know that this is not about interdicting supply lines. Even the President of the United States has abandoned all pretext of using that as a flimsy excuse for financing the Contras. They have stated it is our desire to overthrow, dislocate, et cetera, the government of the Sandinistas. So if our better idea is a commitment to this extraordinary document, stained yellow with age, that appears in one of the buildings in this city, we are violating it right here because we are not living within the context of our Constitution.

Second, our Constitution states, in the first amendment, the right of free speech, but Members have stood up over the last several weeks to express their points of view in opposition to military aid to the Contras. What has been the response? They have been challenged as disloyal. Their patriotism, their basic citizenship has been challenged. They have been redbaited, intimidated, harassed, and harangued.

But we are committed to a better idea, Mr. Chairman, commitment to the Constitution. But we have not lived up to the Constitution in terms of our war-making power, but we would rather do it through proxies.

Third, there is the right of people to directly elect their representatives, and their representatives in turn have the right and the responsibility to articulate their points of view on given issues. But when Members stand up to assert their responsibility, their responsibilities given to them in the Constitution of the United States, press conferences are called, people are challenged, they are pro-Communist, they are anti-American, they are disloyal human beings because they do not walk in lock step.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that Nazi Germany of the 1930's was a nation where people walked in lock step. The great gift that we have been given in this democracy is the right for us to be able to express and assert a different point of view, and I assert that responsibility. I think anyone who challenges that right is challenging the very notion of what a better idea ought to be about.

But let us look at another better idea that we have, a commitment to the rule of law, Mr. Chairman.

Remember the Boland amendment, where we passed the Boland amendment, very straightforward, that no funds shall be used for the purposes of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua. Everyone could understand that very straightforward language.

Do you know how the administration interpreted that language? They said the operative words are "for the purposes of. We have the money, but it is not our purpose to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. But if we give it to another entity whose purpose it is to overthrow the government, we are in technical compliance with the law."

Is that an example of a commitment to a better idea, when we can bend the rule of law, when we are saying to the world that we are a noble nation committed not only to democracy and the Constitution but the rule of law and we show here we are prepared to violate it?

We also have, Mr. Chairman, on the books, a law that is called the Neutrality Act. It says that we cannot finance an individual or group of individuals to attempt to overthrow a government with which we are at peace. We are not at war with the Nicaraguans. We have not declared war. We are in violation of the Neutrality Act.

I have felt so strongly about it, Mr. Chairman, that I have taken this matter up through a number of court procedures, and we have won on every single level. I am sure that some day it will get to the Supreme Court. But we are in violation of the rule of law.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, we are a nation committed to a different idea, a commitment to the sanity of the rule of international law. We are committed to the rule of law, international law. But when the World Court said, "We have jurisdiction in this matter," what did we do? We did not respect that rule of law. We did not respect international law. We did not respect sanity. We walked away from the World Court, when we are saying from other podiums, in other situations, that we must respect the rule of international law.

The Contra aid, in terms of international law, also violates article 15 of the Organization of American States.

Finally, I want to insert something else into this debate that we need to look at. No one, not even the Foreign Affairs Committee, has raised the question of the legal status of the Contras. There are only three things the Contras can be. First, they can be internal dissidents. They do not qualify as internal dissidents under the Geneva accords. If that is not what they are, the only two other things they can be are members of another country's armed forces. Are they our Armed Forces? If they do not qualify as that, the only other alternative is that they are mercenaries and terrorists.

□ 1200

Now, let me tell you why they do not qualify as internal dissidents. There are several specific reasons. Many of the Contras are not Nicaraguan nationals and cannot be classified as internal dissidents.

No. 2, the Contras operate under disunified leadership and are sometimes directed by the CIA and other American citizens.

The Contras control no territory in Nicaragua where they can launch "sustained and concerted military operations."

Finally, they launch their operations from outside Nicaragua. They do not qualify on the basis of international law as internal dissidents.

Are they our Armed Forces and I ask you to answer that question. Are they terrorists and mercenaries?

I ask you in the course of this debate to answer that question. Then we can have an honest debate.

I believe that a better idea is something more than a bigger bomb and aid to the Contras. It is a commitment to dialog, a peaceful and political solution to the myriad problems that must and can be addressed.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The last speaker was rhetorical. He was eloquent and he was wrong. He has enumerated all of the many thousands of things that we in the United States have done wrong over the last 6 years. We are to be ashamed of ourselves for the way we have conducted our foreign policy.

He equated us with, or else he at least referred in his speech, to Nazi Germany. Well, as a matter of fact, there is some similarity about this debate and the issues behind this debate with what happened in that Nazi Germany, and it has nothing to do with United States foreign policy.

Since 1979, Nicaragua has represented a disappointment to all freedom loving people of the Western Hemisphere. When the Sandinista forces overthrew the Somoza government, there were broad promises of freedom and democracy and open elections and pluralist government and peace. Instead, they have delivered nothing but the prospects of a Communist totalitarian repression and aggression, the nature of which has taken root and dominated the economy and life blood of all the governments and nations in which communism has become entrenched, save one, with one exception—Grenada, where the United States foreign policy had something to do with the turnabout of events.

The type of domination that the Communist system imposes, the elimination of all dissent and usurpation of all freedom and the imprisonment of the bodies and the minds and the souls of its victims, its people; all this is the type of thing that is happening in Nicaragua. And that is the type of thing that happened in Nazi Germany to which the gentleman referred.

Witness the evolution of the Communist movement in Nicaragua from the moment the Sandinistas rose to power, despite their assurance that they were going to abide by all the promises that they made to the Organization of American States when they took over; despite the fact that we gave them $120 million to get them on their way because we were glad to get rid of Somoza; despite the fact that we appealed to the World Bank to get them about $200 million in extra credits so that they could go along their way.

See how they constricted and strangled the essence of liberty and independence in systematic fashion so that their people are deprived of liberty, the liberty which we enjoy and which enables people like my predecessor, the speaker before me, to get up here and rant and rave about how wrong we in the United States are.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I move that the gentleman's words be taken down on the grounds that the gentleman has no right to characterize this gentleman's statement. I will be characterized by history, not by the gentleman in the well, and I want the gentleman's words taken down.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will change only one word. I will withdraw the words "rant and rave" and say, "discuss" how wrong we in the United States are.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for realizing that he made a serious error. I thank him very much.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would certainly not want to overcharacterize the gentleman's statements, for whatever they may be.

In 1979 and 1981, key ministries and government agencies were taken over by the Sandinista leaders, so that control began to formulate in Nicaragua. Banks, exports, agricultural reform, were all nationalized. Businesses were confiscated. Homes were turned over to government offices. The press and the labor unions were restricted. The Sandinista militia was created. Mass organizations were created to control labor and students and neighborhoods so that people would report on their neighbors and make sure they were following the proper ideology.

Elections were postponed, violating the promises to the OAS. The opposition was harassed by press censorship and permission was denied to hold rallies. Opponents were reduced to a token role in the council of the state and military cooperation with Cuba and the Soviet Union was begun.

Between 1982 and 1983, there was forced relocation of massive numbers of Indians, Miskito Indians, plus the Sandinistas declared a state of emergency which further curtailed the liberties of all their citizens.

There was harassment of organized religion and the draft was started. There was expansion of the military and the Soviet bloc weapons began to arrive.

The new political party formulated a law which laid the foundation for total FSLN control of the government.

Between 1983 and 1985, there was an election held on November 4, 1984 that was a total sham. It was unfair to its opposition. Four of the seven parties were Communist dominated and the others were totally intimidated into not presenting their case. The radio, the media, was totally dominated and they were not permitted to sell their case. Two of those parties actually withdrew from the elections. One was not even permitted to, and when they stopped working, the government went around and put up their billboards anyway, before the election.

They expanded their draft in the military.

There were Soviet major arms delivered at that time. In fact, to date some $500 million in armaments from the Soviet Union has come to Nicaragua, and another $700 million in economic aid from the Soviet Union has flowed into Nicaragua.

The national assembly statutes severely limited the rights of opposition members.

Then between May 1985 to the present, the pace of the consolidation was accelerated. There was imprisonment, torture, and execution, which are rampant, and which I have discussed in other special orders.

On October 15, 1985, just 6 months ago, civil liberties of all the Nicaraguan people were suspended; censorship was strengthened. The opposition was additionally harassed and intimidated. The Sandinistas began rationing the basic commodities.

Radio Catolico, the Catholic radio station, was closed down.

The church newspaper, Iglasio, was closed down.

The religious, labor, and political leaders were interrogated under humiliating circumstances, and there was a forced draft of seminarians, which had never before existed in the history of the country even under Somoza.

Under previous special orders, I have discussed the forced relocation of the Indians and the imprisonment, the torture, and the execution of citizens at the hands of the Sandinista government.

Newsletters of political parties were forbidden, and so it goes on and on and on.

So we have now in Nicaragua a systematic entrenchment of a Marxist government on the shores of North America, only 1,000 miles south of my home in New Orleans, LA.

The final conclusion could not be clearer. My colleagues, we have a consolidated Communist state on our doorstep close to our Southern borders on the same continent on which we all live and work and raise our children.

Those Sandinistas, those Communists, are closer to me in New Orleans than I am to New York City. The Soviet-Cuban style state borders 50 percent of all our critical sealanes for imports and exports of all products that we bring into the country; as communism continues its expansion throughout Central America, millions of refugees will continue to pour into the United States, like they did taking nothing but the shirts off their backs on the boats that could not even float out to sea in South Vietnam. We are going to have to house them and clothe them and feed them and find them jobs, and also iind the jobs for those they displace. We cannot afford a Nicaraguan-Soviet base.

But most importantly, I heard the gentlewoman from California say that we are going to be sending our troops down there. What we who want to get support for the Contras, the freedom fighters in Nicaragua, who are Nicaraguan citizens, what we want today is to avoid sending our troops, and only provide a relatively small amount of money to let those people fight for freedom in their own country. If we fail to do that, it is an absolute certainty that down the line some day, either next year, 5 years from now, 10 years from now, not only will we be sending much greater amounts of money, but we will be sending our boys, our sons, on some unforeseen border to defend the security of the United States, to defend our citizens, and to spill their blood.

I am the father of three sons, one aged 19, one 16, and one 13. I do not want to see any of them fight in Central America. For anybody to accuse us, who support the funding of the freedom fighters in Nicaragua, to say we want our sons to go to fight and die there, is absolutely insane. Those who keep the President of the United States from supporting these freedom-seeking people today in Nicaragua are guaranteeing that blood will be spilled unnecessarily in the future.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, I yield.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend and commend him for an excellent statement.

I came on the floor and I heard my learned friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] discussing a very important issue, and that is the law, the law of what is going on down there and whether we are on the right side of international law or not.

I would just like to add a small little bit to the mosaic of discussing the law by reading a couple of sentences from a document that I think all discussion of the law ought to commence with, and it says:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights. Among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Now, here is the important part for our purposes:

That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the government, that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government.

Now, I love those words, I think that justifies our own revolution against an existing government, the British Crown.

Now, I suggest to you there is no law, international or otherwise, that justifies and ligitimates and validates the Soviet Union and its client states oppressing and tyrannizing their people and denying them an opportunity to change that government.

They are illegitimate because they deny the consent of the governed.

Now, the Rio Treaty, the U.N. Charter, all those documents which people who wish to accuse us of illegality point to, guarantee the right of self-defense and collective self-defense.

I would suggest that if a government takes power by force and retains power by force and gets assistance from the Soviet Union, from Cuba, from Bulgaria, from the North Koreans, from the East Germans, from the Libyans, from the PLO, that certainly citizens of that country yearning to be free are entitled to some modicum of support from the free world. That is the law. That is the moral law.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is correct and he is eloquent as always.

I would submit that to deny the President his request at this time would not only be bad politics, it would be terrible policy and it would jeopardize the future of all of us, our children and our grandchildren.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the gentleman in the well and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE] have raised one of the very relevant aspects to this debate and that is the legitimacy of the Communist government in Nicaragua. In respect to that and in respect to a reply to my friend, the gentleman from California who wanted to talk about the drug connection, I would like to show the full House some photos that I think raise serious questions about the legitimacy of the Communist government in Nicaragua.

There is only to my knowledge one government in the world that has a governmental policy of exporting cocaine to the children of America, with the possible exception of Cuba, and that is Nicaragua.

These are photographs. This first photograph shows Pablo Escobar in a striped shirt, a Colombian Government official, supervising the loading of cocaine onto a United States bound C-123 transport plane at Nicaragua's Los Brasiles military airport.

The second picture shows Federico Vaughn, a very high government official, the righthand man of Nicaraguan Interior Minister Tomas Borge, a high government official, loading cocaine for American children onto a U.S. bound C-123 transport plane at Los Brasiles military airport in Nicaragua.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. So, if I may reclaim my time, this is not hearsay. This is photographic evidence of participation in drug running by the Nicaraguan officials.

Mr. HUNTER. Yes. The point that I am making is this: That of the thousands and thousands of Contras who are in Nicaragua, I am sure that there are people, just as there are enlisted people and NCO's and officers in any armed struggle who do things that are abuses, I am sure that they can make a case that some of those people have done things that are illegal, whether it is involving drugs, involving abuses, or whatever. Every government has had that problem in any military confrontation that has ever taken place.

But there is only one government that has an official policy of exporting drugs to America's children, with the possible exception of Cuba, and that is Nicaragua.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank the gentleman for his point, and I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, this debate is clearly showing that President Reagan is dividing the citizens of our Nation once again into hawks and doves, and for what purpose? To finance a band of cut-throat mercenaries in the jungles of Central America.

Does the President understand the damage he and his associates, such as Pat Buchanan, do to our country by setting citizen against citizen, by questioning the loyalty of those citizens who believe, as I do, that no U.S. tax money and no U.S. soldiers should be used to interfere in the conflicts of our Latin American neighbors?

Our job here is to make our Nation strong, our people unified, our children fed, our youth educated, our workers employed, and our seniors secure. This task will not be fully undertaken if our energies, attention and money are diverted to foreign wars and our people divided into hostile camps, more concerned with criticizing each other on softness to communism or warmongering than on working together to solve our problems here at home.

The true strength of our Nation rests with union, not division. I asked the President to turn away from his obsession with Nicaragua and to pay attention to our own economy here at home.

I was deeply disturbed to hear that great document, the Declaration of Independence, used in conjunction with the Contras in Honduras. We must remember that the Contras are not in Nicaragua; they are in Honduras. They have no support in Nicaragua. They have taken no territory. The farmers and people there have given them no succor. Otherwise, they would be in villages and towns in Nicaragua. To use that great document, the Declaration of Independence, to characterize the Contras of Nicaragua is, to me, a degradation of that document. That document stands for a free, noble, and decent people.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. I would be glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from California.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago we were given a lecture on the issue of international moral law which justifies taking on Nicaragua. I ask my colleagues: Using the same analogy, why do we not attack the Soviet Union or China or Cuba? The response was that World War III would be detrimental, which precisely makes my point.

The only place where we are prepared to challenge communism is in Third World countries where the people are black, brown, yellow, and red, and where there are problems of poverty and hunger and disease and starvation and death.

That is the contradiction and that is the hypocrisy. We raise this big red menace only where we can beat up on nations like Grenada, 90,000 people, Nicaragua, one of the poorest nations of the world, but not these other countries, these great Communist countries, because we want to keep trading with them. We do not want to engage in World War III, so we intimidate these Third World countries, and that is the contradiction and that is the hypocrisy of this whole act that is taking place on the floor of this Congress today.

Mr. WEAVER. I am reminded by this debate that my theme is on the unity of this country, that we need unity in this country and our people working together. I am reminded by this debate of a debate occurring in the House of Representatives 160 years ago when Jim Madison was President of the United States and the war hawks led us into a war with England, a war of no purpose whatsoever, but because they stirred up the House, stirred up the people so much, we were led into that war, which hurt our Nation greatly. I say unify our Nation. Bring us together, Mr. President, and that is what the American people want.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I have tried to follow events in Latin America since I came to Congress 18 years ago. During the last 5 years, I have paid particular attention to the U.S. policy and its impact on the region.

I have no disagreement with the allegations of the gentleman from Louisiana, the gentleman from Illinois, and the gentleman from Oklahoma, that there is a Marxist government in Nicaragua, and that that government is oppressing its people. But the President of our country has had his policy in Central America for 5 years. He has pretty well had his way for the time that he has occupied the White House.

It may be of interest for Members to know that during the 5 years that Mr. Reagan has been in the White House, we have appropriated $3.4 billion in U.S. tax dollars in support of that policy. I would add that does not include what the CIA may have spent, or the additional appropriations for military training in that region or moneys in addition to that which are unaccounted for.

My question today is: What has U.S. policy wrought in Central America? What has the $3.4 billion-plus of investments in U.S. tax dollars bought for us in Central America?

Mr. Speaker, it has bought mismanagement and morass, even to the extent of providing almost $66 million in aid to the Marxist government in Nicaragua. Here it is in black and white. President Reagan's policy has supported the Communist government in Nicaragua.

What else has it bought? It has bought a heavy economic burden in this country at a time when we are experiencing a serious budget crisis, at a time when our Government is saying no to the farmers, it is saying no to the students, it is saying no to the elderly. Our elderly citizens are being cut from Older Americans assistance because of budgetary constraints, and we are being asked to give $100 million for the Contras in Central America.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would be glad to engage in a debate on the gentleman's time.

Mr. Chairman, the policy has strengthened the Communist government in Nicaragua. It has forced out the moderates and prevented a political solution.

Let me say one more thing, and I will yield to the gentleman.

The policy has alienated our allies. The President of Mexico says that Mr. Reagan's policy is causing anger among the Latin American people, and the President of Colombia this past week said that the United States, like the Soviet Union and like Cuba, is interventionist in the Western Hemisphere, causing disrespect of our Government among our allies.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, parenthetically, I have no respect for anyone who sees a moral equivalency between the Soviet Union and the United States. But the Reagan policies have developed a democracy in Guatemala, for free elections outstanding in El Salvador, a new democracy in Honduras.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I reclaim my time. I do not yield further.

Democracy in Honduras began in 1980 before Ronald Reagan became President.

Mr. HYDE. And it is still there.

□ 1225

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute and 30 seconds to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to respond to what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] has said. First of all, I would like to correct the impression that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] left earlier which suggests that the Sandinista government is so oppressive and so bad that it is out there without any friends at all, and that is simply not true.

In fact, I would quote: "Libyan fighters, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people, have reached them because they fight with us." That was Mr. Qadhafi.

"Your enemies are our enemies," the Sandinistas were told by Yassar Arafat.

"The most important event during the past 2 years in that region (Central America) undoubtedly is the Sandinista victory in Nicaragua and the way things are going, we will have another Cuba there." That is Vladimir Chernyshev, the Soviet Ambassador to Brazil.

So the gentleman was wrong. Nicaragua does have friends.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will yield, I will concede that. The gentleman is correct, they do have friends.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. I would like to respond to the gentleman from Arkansas because what has happened in Central America is this: When I came to Congress, when President Reagan went to the White House 5 years ago, what we had throughout Central America was a host of repressive oligarchies, we had dictatorship, we had military rule.

What we have in Central America today is the greatest spread of freedom and democracy seen in the western world or anywhere in the world in our time, with one exception, one sole exception: Nicaragua.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

I think the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] who just spoke has not characterized the situation correctly when he speaks about this reluctance that he sees on the part of Central American countries to support our policy or to support the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

Let me simply say that the President of Colombia is not angry at the United States for the assassinations and murders of his Supreme Court Justices by weapons that were all traceable to the Sandinistas, to Nicaragua.

Mr. Duarte is not angry at the United States of America for the kidnaping of his daughter. In fact, he blamed Mr. Ortega for helping to orchestrate the terrorist activity that resulted in a member of his family being kidnaped.

As a Congressman who borders Mexico and talks with a number of our friends in Mexico and other countries, let me tell the gentleman that most Members of this body realize that in private conversations, Central American leaders say "the United States is the only hope for Central America, and now we have to go out and put a press release that will tell the world that I do not agree with America's policy because we are afraid." And that is the fact in Central America.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, years ago I lived in a town that had one high school 10 miles away from where I lived. I had a trolley car that took me every morning to school, and I can remember, as I think about it, as I think about what is happening here today, I can remember when I had to make that trolley car, I would sometimes get on the block and see the trolley car going down the next block, and then I would figure maybe I can run fast enough to catch the trolley car, because otherwise I would have to spend half of a day to hike to get to that high school.

What I am worried about here today is this seems to me to be the last opportunity for us to do something constructive in this particular area. It seems to me if we do not do this particular thing the President has asked, we are really saying forget it, we will try to hike those 10 or 15 miles to the high school.

Now that may not be an illustration that means much to you because today young people in high school have automobiles. I owned my first automobile when I was almost 40 years of age, and that was given to me by the Government at the end of World War II. So I came from a different era and we do a lot of things different today, and we neither have had to hike or to catch the car.

Today we have an opportunity to maybe do something important in our day. It is not very expensive. Actually $100 million sounds like a lot of money, but earlier this week, we gave $250 million to Ireland. There are counties around my area that are a lot worse off than Ireland is, and in many ways, and we did not flip an eyebrow about that. We have $100 million here that we are worrying about so much. There are reasons to do it, and there are some important reasons. First of all, there was an agreement by the Government of Nicaragua, the people, in the revolution that has occurred, that they would abide by democracy, they would abide by the Organization of American States' decision in this matter to move toward democracy, and the Sandinistas have not done that. So the purpose really of this money is to try to get an opportunity to have a dialog which will bring us to the fulfillment of the things that these people in Nicaragua have already agreed to, and to have free elections, or if you cannot have free elections, at least not to export communism.

The international law matter has been dealt with here. That was a matter of grave concern to me in 1984 and 1985 when this matter was being considered. I introduced a resolution which went to the heart of this matter, and I presented it to the Department of State and to the White House. This resolution provides what is good, sound, international law and says that if our defense interests are imperiled that we can do something about it. We have a right to do so under every international law.

There are ways to do this improperly, but the way in which the President has couched his terms in this matter is correct. Let us read what he said in presenting this to the Congress. He said:

> The actions by the United States . . . authorized by the approval of this request, are consistent with the right of the United States to defend itself. . . . Such actions are directed to achieving a comprehensive and a verifiable agreement among the countries of Central America, based upon the 1983 Contadora Document of Objectives, and internal reconciliation within Nicaragua . . . without the use of force by the United States.

That is the language that brings this particular bill to the floor. It is a good international law. It is a good moral law, but it is a good international law, and we have the preservation in this matter of not sending troops.

There are limitations to the idea of freeing all or helping all freedom-fighting people throughout the world. We may not be able to do this. In the case of Hungary and Poland, our Government, under President Eisenhower, decided that we were not able to do it. So there may be things that we cannot do. Certainly in this particular instance, it is something that is doable.

People say why do you even worry about Nicaragua? Why do we worry about it? Certainly we do not worry about just it, because it is a country of 3 million people, a very small piece of geography. What we are worried about is the Moscow/client relationship. That is what you worry about. That is what is imperiling America.

Nicaragua doing it? Not a bit. Nicaragua is a base for terrorism. Nicaragua is a base for unlimited amounts of Soviet arms and munitions, and infiltration into the countries around them.

Think about the dismay in Mexico, a great country, a great sister country to our own, and yet how dismayed they are about their economic situation.

The largest city in the world now is Mexico City, impoverished. A million and a half Mexicans come across the border every year into the United States. Very distressed, very upset, the very sort of government that the Russians would like to take over.

That client status with Moscow is the thing that is giving us reasons for apprehension. It is a real apprehension. It is not a fuzzy thing. It is not a complicated thing that is hard to understand. It is a real client relationship. The Russians are using Cuba today throughout the world. Cuba is almost a secondary, even a first type of nation today because of its client status with Moscow. Moscow is using Cuba and it will use Nicaragua the same way.

Here on our own U.S. territory and very close to our own boundaries, we have this threat. To me it is just like that trolley car going down the street. We ought to catch up with it and we ought to do this. We ought to support the President.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL].

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I wish some infantrymen could hear some of the debate that is going on here today. I served with the 2d Infantry Division in Korea, and when I was alerted in June of 1950 to stamp out the Communist invasion of South Korea, I had not the slightest idea constitutionally or legally how I got over there. But having been a volunteer in the U.S. Army, I assumed that was a part of the obligation, and so I went under the United Nations mandate and received a Bronze Star and Purple Heart for valor.

So those that believe which way I vote today might not put me on the right side of democracy, I do not have too much worry about that.

But when the President and the Secretary of State talk about excising a cancer or wiping out a government, to those of us who have been involved in combat, and recognizing that when you have those type of political and in this case military objectives, that we believe that you do not talk in terms of $100 million, you talk in terms of getting on with the declaration of war and do what has to be done. Certainly if this small country is a threat to the most powerful country in the world, I would want the Armed Forces Committee or the relevant committees to start talking about that rather than having us to believe that we do not think enough about our country to put it where it really should be, and that is with our military forces.

I do not believe that there is anyone in the House that would want to send our American boys to Nicaragua. But if the threat is as real as people have said it is, I do not think that they want American democracy to be left in the hands of the Contras.

But that is not why I came to the floor today. I came to the floor because the President's silence about countries that produce drugs, allies of the United States, countries that have violated treaties with the United Nations, treaties with the United States, countries that we give money to, Peru, Bolivia, Columbia, Mexico, it always amazed me why the Secretary of State and the President, and really Ambassador Kirkpatrick, and to a limited extent our new Ambassador was always so silent in terms of criticizing these countries.

In any event, when the President spoke about drug trafficking in Nicaragua, I immediately, as chairman of the Select Narcotics Committee, tried to find out where those pictures came from and what they were about. And it turns out that the drug agency, the Drug Administration, rebuts the Reagan charge. The drug agents indicate that there is no proof that Nicaraguan leaders are traffickers, and I refer to Assistant Secretary of State John Thomas' testimony before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on March 11, 1986, where he indicates it is almost impossible to gather accurate information on a continuing basis. The Sandinistas officially have denied all of the allegations, and that it appears as though the one aide to one of the officials actually was indicted in Florida.

I am suggesting that if we believe that trafficking is taking place in Nicaragua, we ought to take a hard look and see what is happening in Mexico, because we would send in the entire Armed Forces if it warrants sending $100 million to Nicaragua.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I would say to the gentleman from New York, for whom I have the highest respect, that the difference between the countries he mentioned, Peru, Colombia, et al., and Nicaragua is that there is no allegation, never has been, that the countries he mentioned were sending drugs or facilitating the sending of drugs as part of the official government policy, whereas there is direct testimony from a former high official in the Nicaraguan Interior Ministry, Alvaro Baldizon, who has been here and who testified before the Committee on Foreign Affairs Task Force on International Narcotics Control last week that was official Nicaraguan Government policy.

I would point out that at that same meeting, Thomas J. Byrne, Deputy Assistant Administrator for Intelligence, Drug Enforcement Administration referring to the investigation they made as a result of this investigation, 12 persons, including a Nicaraguan national, were indicted in the Southern District of Florida, and he mentioned them, including the Nicaraguan, Frederico Vaughn, aide to the Nicaraguan Minister of the Interior, Thomas Borge.

□ 1240

To date, four of the defendants have pleaded guilty. One more was tried and found guilty of that charge.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Nevada [Mrs. VUCANOVICH].

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this resolution. I was one of nine Members of Congress who spent the weekend in Nicaragua, and we had the opportunity to meet with Vice President Sergio Ramirez, the vice president of the Sandinistas, and also Mr. Tinoco, who was the Deputy Foreign Minister, and Mr. Saul Arana, who is the leader of the North American Desk.

We also met with the Permanent Commission on Human Rights, and we met with Cardinal Obando y Bravo; we met with the owners and editors of La Prensa, and we met with labor leaders, and members of the opposition parties.

My impression, on meeting with the Sandinista acting president, Mr. Ramirez, was first that he was lying to us; and second, that he was visibly irritated at having to meet with us at all.

Later, after we left, it was quoted in one of the pro-government papers that the only reason he met with us was because he felt that, if not, it would be used against them in their fight to keep away from getting aid to the Contras.

One of the most blatant lies that he told when he first met with us was that they were a non-allied nation, and that it was pure propaganda that they were a Marxist-Leninist country.

We asked him about Cuban pilots flying the Soviet-made helicopters, and he said, "No Cubans fly our planes."

He also stated that the Sandinistas, the Communists, did not begin receiving arms from Cuba or the Soviets until they were faced with external aggression. He denied that they were exporting arms or violence, and it continued when we talked to him about the political prisons in Nicaragua.

First he said that there were no prisons, and then he changed to say there were no clandestine prisons. He was arrogant and tyrannical when we talked about free elections which has been promised to the people and he said, the party was preparing a new constitution and they would get around to holding elections. And he said that they were elected until 1991. When he was corrected and told it was until 1990, he just shrugged, as if it really did not make any difference.

When we tried to talk to him about a dialog of their refusal to sign on the Contadora process, he responded, saying: "Don't ask me any complex questions, only ask questions that we can answer with a yes or with a no."

In talking with the leader of the Nicaraguan version of the chamber of commerce about what would happen if the U.S. Congress decided not to help the Contras, he begged us to decide. He said, "Please don't delay. Don't bleed it out. If you're not going to help us, tell us so that we can simply succumb to slavery."

Believe me, time is on the side of the Sandinistas. The Communists will agree to negotiation or anything else which will delay aid to the Contras, buying time so that they can continue to crush the opposition. I am convinced that if we withhold this aid to the Contras, we will have provided another Soviet government on our shores just as we have in Cuba.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN].

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I've never been a fan of the Sandinistas. In 1979, after the Nicaraguan revolution, I voted against President Carter's foreign aid request for the new government. Given what's happened since—censorship, crackdowns on freedom of speech and religion—I like them even less.

But the question isn't whether the Sandinistas deserve an award for congeniality.

The question is whether another $100 million in military aid to the Contras will somehow transform that government into a citadel of democracy.

The question is whether we should be taking $10,000 per Contra out of the Treasury at a time when farm export programs are being cut. When public schools in Oregon don't have enough money to keep their doors open. When economic development programs are going begging.

The answer is no.

I've got the facts to back up my decision. I'm on the Appropriations Defense Subcommittee, which oversees the CIA. I've had the briefings, seen the classified photos. And I'm convinced the administration path is paved with thorns.

The White House doesn't want to lead the Sandinistas to the negotiating table. They want to lead them out of Nicaragua. As Donald Regan has made clear, the White House goal is overthrow.

We know the Sandinistas are no Boy Scouts, but neither are some other governments. South Africa has a repressive regime. So does South Korea. If the use of subversive force is to be America's answer to all governments we find offensive, then why, for instance, are we financing no Contras in South Africa to liberate the downtrodden blacks in that racist, repressive country?

Is it because the administration is soft on racism? Or is it because the use of covert wars in every country we disagree with is impractical, not to mention illegal.

Yet, the White House has chosen war over negotiations for the Sandinistas. And they're pulling out all the stops to win these funds.

The administration is, unbelievably, trying to steal this $100 million from U.S. ammunition accounts, which are already in short supply and critical to U.S. readiness.

President Reagan speaks of the fall of Mexico and the domino states in Central America. He warns of a sea of Communist red lapping at the borders of Texas. But these scare tactics won't work.

Now, though the CIA created a Contra civilian corps for political cover, there's no hiding the fact that former Somocistas run the Contra military operation; 9 out of 10 members of the Contra general staff are former Somoza henchmen.

Nicaraguans remember Somoza, though the administration is trying hard to forget. The White House has papered over the Somoza connection, creating new identities for the Contras. "Freedom fighters." Distant cousins of the French Resistance. Descendants of Valley Forge. Who's fooling whom?

The Contras can't win because they lack popular support as well as support in the Southern Hemisphere. The majority of the so-called domino countries oppose the Contra aid request.

The White House whispers that Central American leaders are afraid to speak out, cowed by the Sandinista military machine. That's absurd. Rebuffing U.S. assistance, the Contadora nations have consistently called for negotiations.

Mr. Chairman, frightened people don't ask for peace talks when they could have guns instead.

The truth of the matter is that the White House adamantly opposes regional negotiations that could prohibit foreign military bases, advisers, or troops in Central America, the goals they profess to want.

Though there's no hope the Contras will succeed, the White House keeps sounding the call to arms. Not with our boys—yet. Full use of American troops will happen, they claim, only if Congress doesn't approve this request.

Mr. Chairman, it's not a case of either-or. If we approve this plan, it's a question of when.

The White House has already let slip that the Green Berets are part of the $100 million package deal for training now. Down the road, who knows? There are no conditions on military aid or training of any kind in this request.

If the administration wants to pull out all the stops to overthrow the Sandinista government, let them say so. And let them work to build support for direct U.S. involvement. But let's stop claiming that $100 million is the magic number that will buy peace for Central America.

If U.S. military pressure alone could do the trick the Sandinistas would be holding open elections right now.

For nearly 3 years, the United States has had 6,000 troops on training exercises in Honduras. We've constructed permanent military installations. We've pumped up the Salvadoran and Honduran Armed Forces, offered military aid to Costa Rica and Guatemala. We've mined Nicaraguan harbors, embargoed sugar exports and used the Contras to disrupt coffee harvests.

And, Mr. Chairman, the Sandinistas are still there. If we approve this aid they'll still be there. But where will we be?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Arkansas indicated a while ago that—as well as some of his colleagues—that President Reagan's policy was a failed policy.

I might remind them that for 18 months, the majority in this House was instrumental in getting aid cut off from the freedom fighters down there, and yet they grew. If there is anything that is a failed policy down there, it is the policy of the majority in letting these funds be stopped, thus encouraging the Soviets, Cubans, and Nicaraguans to increase the repression of the people of that region.

The gentleman from Arkansas talked about the Nicaraguan Government oppressing its people and yes, he is concerned about that; but the one thing he did not mention was that they are exporting revolution throughout Central America and Latin America.

There are 19 countries south of the Mexican-American border and 12 of those countries have either weapons that came through Nicaragua or terrorists trained in Nicaragua within their borders. This is a fact that the State Department has stated in their last document that they gave to the Congress.

Twelve of the nineteen countries are being influenced by the Nicaraguan Communist government.

I was in Chalatenango Province in El Salvador, and I saw firsthand Communist weapons that came through Nicaragua. You might say, "Well, how do you know they came through Nicaragua?" I questioned a captured Communist guerrilla, and he told me that his weapons come through Nicaragua.

The weapons that we saw were Bulgarian handgrenades, Soviet mortars, M-16 rifles that came through from Vietnam, that could be traced back by their serial numbers to Vietnam, weapons that came from Venezuela that were sold to the Communist Sandinistas before they took power that could be traced back to them.

Now there are a number of issues that I would like to see raised today we have not talked about and because time is limited, I will not be able to go into my entire speech.

One, how can democracy survive without economic growth, and what person in their right mind is going to invest in a country that has a Communist expansionist government on its borders that is undermining the government that exists, as is the case in El Salvador?

What American company is going to go down there and invest if they think that country might be undermined and fall. We know that the Communists are in there. The headquarters of the Communist guerrillas in El Salvador is in Managua. They are training terrorists in Managua to export revolution into El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras.

One of the things that I think we really should talk about is, what is it going to be like in the future if we do not act? Our last commanding general in Vietnam was General Weyend, and he was asked this question:

How do you rate the motivation of the Viet Cong?

His Answer:

The Viet Cong had superior motivation and I am perplexed over why. * * * They lost over 1 million dead in the war. * * * Every family in North Vietnam must have suffered a loss. All endured hardship.

Why didn't they protest? Why did they continue to send their sons south to almost certain death in a cause they hardly understood?

Here is his answer:

I know of a North Vietnamese textbook that gives a clue—early ideological indoctrination. For example, arithmetic was taught to Viet Cong children in terms of how many imperialist warmongers would be left if 4 appeared and 2 were killed?

As soon as the Communist Sandinistas took power in Nicaragua, they imported 600 Cuban teachers. This first-grade textbook is what they are teaching from down there right now, the same thing they taught the Communist Vietnamese children in North Vietnam.

They have had 7 years to indoctrinate those children. Here is how they teach them to add: Two AK-47 machineguns plus two machineguns plus two machineguns are six machineguns. Three handgrenades plus three handgrenades are six handgrenades.

□ 1250

And it gets worse. As they get older the indoctrination gets more severe. This is what we are facing. If we do not deal with the problem today our children are going to have to face it 5 or 10 years down the road. They are going to have to fight an army of zealots, Communist zealots who want to take away our freedom as well as the freedoms of all the other countries in this hemisphere.

They are already in 12 of the 19 countries. They are teaching these children this today and we are going to have to deal with it.

I have a boy who is 11 years old. I do not want him to have to face that. If we help the Contras today who are fighting for the freedom of their homeland, who are fighting for the revolution kidnaped from their homeland, who are fighting for the revolution kidnaped from them by the Communist Sandinista government, we will not have to use our young men—our soldiers to defend our freedoms down there in the future. But my great fear is that my colleagues cn the other side of the aisle will stand idly by and let the Contras go down to defeat, let the revolution spread into these other countries and our children will be involved in a war that is not necessary.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I would hope that at the end of this debate we would reject the President's proposal to provide $100 million in aid to the Contras to be split between military aid and humanitarian aid. It has been a long road to this date with this administration and with its various proposals to fund both covert and overt aid and fighting forces inside of Nicaragua.

A lot of discussion has been heard today about a policy. I really think what this shows is an absence of a policy. A decision was made back in late 1981, a finding before the Intelligence Committees to allow for covert activities within the borders of Nicaragua. That was a day when a group of people were standing around the Oval Office asking what to do and somebody stepped in and said, "We can take care of this for you."

Since that time in 1981, this Congress has been lied to about the amount of money spent on the covert operation, and it has been lied to about the purposes for which that money was spent. We have been told the reason for our policy was drug interdiction and arms interdiction. We have found out that we have engaged in illegal activities; we engaged in the mining of harbors, and in the production of assassination manuals. This country was called before the World Court because of those actions. We have been embarrassed with our allies when the mining of the harbors took place.

Until last June, each and every time that this Congress scrutinized our policy in Nicaragua the Congress said, "No." We did not want to engage in the mining of harbors. We did not want to engage in the killing of Nicaraguan citizens. We wanted a policy to bring about change. But from the day that that finding was made in the Oval Office and sent to the Hill, the policy has been the military overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government, and that is the policy today.

Now what has happened to date? Tens of thousands of ralliers, they were called in the early days were to come forth in Nicaragua. They did not come forth. So we continued to prime the pump with money and to bring forth these people.

In fact that revolution against the Sandinistas that the administration talks about in the form of the Contras did not spring forth in Nicaragua. We imported the Argentinians, then the best practitioners of terrorism in South America, to train these people. Our Government tried to recruit people to serve in this Contra force. I have people in my hometown whom they were trying to recruit to go and to train and to participate in these activities inside of Nicaragua.

We have built this revolution from the Oval Office of the United States. We have built this revolution through the covert activities of the CIA. We were the ones who were lobbing weapons fired into the Miskito villages on the Rio Coco. The fact of the matter is that it has been by the use of American dollars and training that the Contras have grown. But what has happened is that we see no connection, by the testimony of our own State Department, between the Contras and the majority of the population in Nicaragua.

What we see rather are random acts of violence against those who would pick coffee. These are the same acts that many of us condemn in El Salvador, actions against civilian targets and mayors of cities and civilian populations. We are funding the Contras to commit the same guerrilla acts that we condemn in El Salvador—to kill people who go out and pick cotton, to kill people who go out and pick coffee, to kill the farmers that would grow it. And let us understand that these farmers are not necessarily vigorous supporters of the Sandinista Government. In fact, some 80 percent of the Nicaraguan agricultural economy is in the private sector, not in the Marxist sector but in the private sector.

Those farmers who continue to grow are the ones who are being punished by American sponsored forces. Those are the victims of the Contras.

You know, not many Sandinista officials, no members of the Directorate, have been put under fire by the Contras. Not many of their commanders and field commanders have been put under fire. But the peasants, the women, the children, the men of Nicaragua have been killed by the Contras, in the pursuit of a policy of "putting pressure on the Sandinista regime." The machoism of Members of Congress to stand here and talk about "putting pressure" when in fact that translates to somebody else dying for your convictions. The machoism of financing the Contras to run through the countryside with no military objective in the sense that we truly know it, to carry out random acts of violence is wrong. This policy has been discredited in each and every rationale that has been brought to the floor of this Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY].

Mr. DELAY. Before the gentleman from California walks off the floor, would he care to enumerate where he gets all this information about the atrocities of the Contras killing cam-pesinos that support the Contras and feed them for days, give them three meals a day and hot coffee?

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELAY. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of California. It comes clearly from those organizations and our own State Department that has admitted that these atrocities have taken place. We have argued about the numbers.

Mr. DELAY. Reclaiming my time, would the gentleman please list those organizations?

Mr. MILLER of California. I would be delighted to provide that for the gentleman anytime he would like to have it.

Mr. DELAY. The gentleman cannot list them?

Mr. MILLER of California. Would the gentleman like to start?

Mr. LIVINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the law firm of Reichler & Applebaum here in Washington, DC, sent two teams to Nicaragua to do a human rights study. These two teams went down there and came back with a study alright. The study was completely paid for by the Communist Sandinista government. The Communist Sandinista's law firm here in Washington, Reichler & Applebaum, received $350,000 in legal fees from the Sandinista government. This is one of the reports that the gentleman from California is talking about. This is pure Communist disinformation that the people of this country are being fed.

Mr. MILLER of California. The gentleman will not ascribe to me which reports I am referring to. I will refer to my own reports. If the gentleman wants a list of those, I will provide a list to the gentleman of those reports.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. MILLER of California. The regular order would be for the gentleman not to characterize my remarks. That would be the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. PANETTA). The gentleman from Indiana has the time yielded by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I want to say to the people of this body and the people who may be watching this across this country that much of this information that we are hearing is Communist disinformation paid for by the Communist Sandinista government that is going into the living rooms of this country and it is just not so. The fact of the matter is that there are many more human rights violations on the part of the Sandinistas.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana has the time.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Well, it has been decimated, Mr. Chairman. But in summary, the law firm of Reichler & Applebaum with the help of some of our colleagues in this body helped get a report published that was paid for completely by the Communist Sandinista government, published by the Washington Office on Latin American Affairs. It has been fed to the people of this country. It is pure Communist disinformation.

I yield back to my colleague.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding because we started off this debate with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY] suggesting that we ought to have a high level of debate here. And I think our side has certainly attempted to do that. But, you know, it is somewhat embarrassing that the other side does not have enough confidence in their own arguments that when they are standing in this well engaged in debate that they will not yield to our side. It is somewhat embarrassing then that the same gentleman who will not yield sees fit to come out on the floor and then interrupt the people who have time on our side. And I think it behooves the debate if the people would yield.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The point is, as the gentleman knows, people are ascribed 5 minutes, 3 minutes, to characterize their view of the debate, and the gentleman knows very often he does not yield from time to time. Is he about to cut off the debate?

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman that just as I have just yielded to you and you have interrupted my time, our people are yielding. The point is that the gentleman's people are not. It seems to me if we want to engage in a real debate on this House floor the gentleman's people should have enough confidence in their point of view to yield and have the facts brought to this floor. And that is what the gentleman is not doing. And I say it is embarrassing.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman makes a very excellent point. The gentleman from California, who refused to yield, turned around and then asked the gentleman from Texas to yield, and the gentleman from Texas did yield. We need a debate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire how much time remains on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has consumed 1 hour and 16 minutes. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] has consumed 57 minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will let the gentleman from Mississippi proceed, then.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY].

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, just two comments. First of all, much has been made of the fact that immediately after the Sandinistas came to power this House provided assistance to the Nicaraguan Government. Do you know who was asking us to do it at the time? The fellows who were asking us to do it at the time were fellows by the name of Adolfo Calero and Mr. Robelo, who is outside the Chambers right now; two of the three leaders of the Contras today are the people who asked this House at that time to provide the aid to Nicaragua, not to strengthen the Sandinistas but to give the business community and the moderates in that society an opportunity to survive. That is who was urging the House to do it at the time.

Second, we were told by a previous speaker, "What we have had in Central America the last 4 years," and I am quoting directly, "is the greatest spread of democracy in our time." Well, if that is the case, then I fail to understand why the panic. Why if we have had the greatest spread of democracy in our time in Central America, why don't we listen to those very democracies who tell us, "Don't worry, folks, we are not going to go down the drain if you don't provide $100 million to the Contras."

What they are telling us is that they will probably have a better chance of going down the drain if we do provide that assistance than if we don't. They want that $100 million to develop their own economies, not to give to some half-baked Contra military force that does not have a prayer of winning anyhow.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and I yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. PANETTA). The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 540 to provide $100 million in economic and military assistance to the Contras fighting the Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

The President's requests seeks to address the one aspect of U.S. policy toward Central America on which there is not a consensus.

I. AREAS OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Chairman, it is worth noting at the outset that there are significant and large areas of agreement between the Congress and the President on Central America:

Growing out of the Kissinger Commission and its important work, there is an increasing consensus that the United States has important interests in Central America which need to be both promoted and protected;

There is also a consensus and wide congressional support for economic and security assistance for friendly democratic states throughout the region;

And there is a realization that we have a vital stake in helping our neighbors address serious problems of economic and social deprivation.

There are also many large areas of agreement on the serious and deteriorating situations in Nicaragua.

President Reagan spoke Sunday night for a vast majority of Americans in what he said about Nicaragua:

We all oppose what the President called Nicaragua's efforts to "subvert and topple its democratic neighbors";

We also would oppose giving, as the President said, "The Soviet Union a beachhead in North America";

We all would oppose Nicaragua threatening Mexico;

We all would oppose creating a situation where, as the President said, "desperate Latin peoples by the millions would begin fleeing north into the cities of the southern United States";

We all would oppose the creation of what the President called "a second Cuba, a second Libya on the doorsteps of the United States";

We all would oppose Nicaragua's effort, as the President said, "to sponsor terror in El Salvador, Costa Rica, Guatemala, and Honduras";

We all oppose the Sandinistas' efforts to repress the Nicaraguan people and establish totalitarian rule in Nicaragua; and

We would oppose the role of Nicaragua in international drug trafficking to which the President referred.

In short, the President spoke for most of us when he addressed some of our goals in Nicaragua and what we want to avoid. We are all patriotic Americans and we all share common goals of promoting democracy, human rights and freedom and of opposing totalitarian rule of the right or left and Soviet and Communist efforts to export revolution.

But the crux of the debate today is not about goals we do share but about means to achieve those goals and it is here that there are differences.

II. AREAS OF DISAGREEMENT

The choice before us is not between aid to the Contras and the triumph of communism. If it were, the choice would be easy, since we cannot allow the triumph of communism in Central America. The choices before us include better alternatives to protect U.S. interests.

In brief, we simply do not see that the means the President has pursued for 5 years, and which he now seeks to expand, have achieved, or have even begun to achieve, the goals that we all share. Indeed, we are impressed that each of the goals is farther from us today than it was 5 years ago:

The Soviet and Cuban military presence in Nicaragua has increased, from 600 to 800 Cubans in mid-1981 to some 3,000 Cuban and 300 Soviet and Eastern bloc military advisers today;

On President Reagan's watch, by his own admission, the Sandinistas have strengthened their control in Nicaragua and the country has become a Communist state, something it wasn't in 1981;

The Sandinistas have increased their military forces to a size disproportionate to those of their neighbors in the region;

The Sandinistas continue, and according to the administration, are expanding the export of revolution throughout the region;

The possibilities for democracy in Nicaragua have worsened considerably and political polarization and repression have increased;

The Contra war until now has made a negotiated settlement more remote and has not forced the Sandinistas to negotiate;

The Contra war in its present form is causing the Sandinistas pain but has little chance of overthrowing them or forcing them to change their policies; and Increasing the military pressure will only cause more bloodshed, destruction, and the worsening of each of these trends.

A. WE DISAGREE WITH THE PRESIDENT'S IMPRECISE RHETORIC.

First, the President has not spoken with precision on the goals of U.S. policy.

Sometimes the President speaks of negotiations, and sometimes he speaks of military victory. He said Sunday night: "We have sought—and still seek—a negotiated peace and a democratic future in a free Nicaragua";

He also said last week: "There are over 20,000 freedom fighters who are desperately waiting for everything from shoes to ammunition. And when they get them they'll move. And when they move, they'll win.";

While his diplomats say over and over again that the policy of the administration is to seek changes in Nicaragua through pressure and negotiations, the President talks about making the Sandinistas "say uncle" and talks about "winning"; and

This imprecision has characterized this administration's approach to Nicaragua from the first, and it has led to confused objectives and flawed policy.

Second, the President has not spoken with precision on his reasons for funding the Contras:

The rationale has shifted from the need to interdict alleged arms shipments to El Salvador, to pressuring the Sandinistas to hold elections, to giving the Contras a bargaining chip in dealing with the Sandinistas, to forcing the Sandinistas to restructure their government, to forcing the Sandinistas to negotiate with the Contras.

B. WE DISAGREE WITH THE PRESIDENT'S ASSESSMENT OF THE PRESENT THREAT POSED BY NICARAGUA TO UNITED STATES VITAL INTERESTS

The President's assessment is exaggerated:

The President has said: "If we don't want to see the map of Central America covered in a sea of red, eventually lapping at our own borders, we must act now.";

He has said: "If we abandon our allies in freedom and allow the Communists to establish a permanent beachhead on the American mainland, we will be living with the consequences for decades to come.";

He has said: "Nicaragua is a foreign policy question of supreme importance which goes to the heart of our country's freedom and future."; and

He has said: "Nothing less that the security of the United States is at stake."

These are not careful statements of policy. If the President means what he says, then he should have sent in the marines to Managua yesterday. Our rhetoric and actions do not mesh. If vital and supreme United States interests are at stake in Nicaragua, then why are we trying to fund a ragtag group of ineffective and untrained peasants to protect them? The $100 million will not achieve our purposes if the threat is what the President describes.

The fact is that Nicaragua represents a different kind of threat to United States interests than the President states. Central America is not covered in a sea of red. The trend is in the other direction, as Guatemala, Costa Rica, El Salvador, and Honduras have conducted free elections and help peaceful transitions of Government. The President himself is fond of making this point, and he cannot have it both ways; and Nicaragua is not an issue of supreme national importance; it is a small, dirt poor country with scarce human and material resources. It does not today represent a serious threat to the security of the United States. It possesses not a single advanced, sophisticated aircraft.

The President does need to make clear that we will accept no Soviet bases, and no weapons to intimidate the region. The United States will not permit the establishment in Nicaragua of Soviet or other hostile military bases or the introduction of offensive weapons that directly threaten other countries in Latin America or the United States. The Soviets must have no doubt that that kind of conduct will not be tolerated by the United States.

C. WE DISAGREE WITH THE PRESIDENT'S DIPLOMATIC STRATEGY BECAUSE IT WILL NOT WORK

The President has a diplomatic strategy of seeking to pressure the Sandinistas into a dialog with the Contras. The United States has said it will resume discussions with the Sandinistas when these talks begin.

This flawed strategy has not and will not work because it requires the Sandinistas to relinquish power. They will not share power. They will not negotiate their own survival. They will not do so with a gun pointed at their heads;

The President says his request for $100 million is "directed toward achieving peace based on the Contadora document of objectives and a democratic reconciliation in Nicaragua." Yet the President's diplomatic efforts emphasize—not the Contadora approach—but a flawed bilateral approach to negotiations;

Every time the administration wants Congress to provide more aid to the Contras, it proclaims its commitment to negotiations—but that commitment disappears after the aid is granted. The President has had 5 years to negotiate—but no progress has been made;

In 1983, the administration promised that it would encourage church-mediated negotiations between the Contras and the Sandinistas, if Congress approved more Contra aid;

In January 1985, the Reagan administration broke off its bilateral talks with the Sandinistas;

In June 1985, as part of the $27 million Contra aid package, the President again agreed to encourage a church-mediated internal dialog and a regional Contadora settlement; and

This time, the President has appointed Philip Habib as his new special emissary to Central America, and claims that a "new" diplomatic effort will be made—to force the Sandinistas to negotiate with the Contras.

The administration is simply using Mr. Habib's standing as a negotiator in order to win congressional support for its policy. Its commitment to viable negotiations remains suspect, however, so long as it can make no appreciable progress toward even the start of negotiations and so long as it favors an approach to negotiations which has been and remains flawed.

The administration has stated repeatedly that it will settle for nothing less than a wholesale "restructuring" of the Sandinista government. It is not surprising that its diplomatic initiatives have led nowhere.

D. WE DISAGREE WITH THE PRESIDENT'S UNILATERAL APPROACH BECAUSE IT HAS NOT WORKED AND WILL NOT WORK

It isolates the United States. No democratic government in Latin America and no democracy in the world supports U.S. policy.

The United States is embarked on a lonely crusade of support for the Contras, and such a policy, no matter what its temporary gains may be, cannot be sustained over time and cannot in the end succeed;

Thirteen Governments representing over 85 percent of the population of Latin America support Contadora and a negotiated settlement of conflict in Central America. No Latin Government publicly supports United States funding of the Contra war effort and the Contadora governments have asked the United States to resume bilateral talks with Nicaragua; and

The European Community and Japan are on record firmly in support of Contadora. Neither the European Community nor Japan support United States funding of the Contras.

Leaders in the region are becoming more outspoken on the U.S. role in the Contra war:

President-elect Arias of Costa Rica has stated: "If I were Mr. Reagan, I would give that money to Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica for economic aid and not military aid to the Contras. . . . You won't get a negotiation with the anti-Sandinistas giving more money to the Contras";

In his inaugural address President Cerezo of Guatemala stated his opposition to "the conflicts of the superpowers which have chosen to play out the proxy war—in our region—that they do not dare play in their own.";

President Betancur of Columbia: "I think that an initiative such as the request for $100 million taken by President Reagan is wrong. . . . I know we can get more through negotiation.";

Foreign Minister Caputo of Argentina spoke on behalf of all the Contadora ministers at their recent meeting with Secretary Shultz: "we think the—Contadora draft—document reflects the predominant thinking throughout Latin America.";

That document, it should be remembered, calls for the cessation of support for irregular forces which operate in the region. That includes the Contras;

Our friends in Central America regard U.S. military intervention as a more destabilizing threat than the existence of the Sandinista government in Nicaragua;

The Contra war frustrates efforts for a regional settlement which is essential to preserving and promoting democracies in the area. European as well as Latin American allies see the necessity of a negotiated settlement as the only possible practical alternative to a lengthy and unwinnable war. Unilateral U.S. policies cannot achieve success.

E. WE DISAGREE WITH THE PRESIDENT'S TACTIC OF PUTTING MILITARY PRESSURE ON THE SANDINISTAS TO MAKE INTERNAL REFORMS BECAUSE IT HAS NOT WORKED AND WILL NOT WORK

The lesson of the recent past is clear. The more we have unilaterally tried to pressure the Sandinistas—whether from aid to the Contras, U.S. military manuevers, or an economic boycott—the more repressive they have become and the more remote negotiations have grown.

United States military pressure has not caused relaxation and reform in Nicaragua but repression. The administration's support for a 5-year war against Nicaragua has also driven the Sandinistas further into the Soviet embrace, as the Sandinistas have turned to the only nations that would help them;

Besides, the Contras are simply not capable, whether we fund them or not, or altering Sandinista policies and orientation;

There is growing popular discontent in Nicaragua with the Sandinistas but the Contras have been incapable of capitalizing on that discontent. The Contras have no credible political program and no mass following in Nicaragua to enable them to challenge the Sandinistas;

The problem with the Contras is not that they lack boots and ammunition but that they have no significant support among the people of Nicaragua.

F. WE DISAGREE WITH THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY BECAUSE IT RESTS THE DEFENSE OF THE U.S. NATIONAL INTEREST ON THE CONTRAS

They are a weak reed upon which to lean:

The President accurately states much of his criticism of the Sandinista government. But he is absolutely blind to the faults of the Contras;

We have provided to date some $100 million to the Contras. They do not control a single town or village. They control less territory than ever before. They stay primarily in safe haven in Honduras;

Some of their leaders have democratic credentials, but they are commanded primarily by former Somoza national guardsmen;

They have waged war largely against civilian targets, attacking buses, agricultural workers, villages, civilian government officials—but not Sandinista military units;

Their tactics of terror and human rights abuses have been repeatedly documented by independent groups;

The record of both sides in Nicaragua leaves much to be desired. Surely the United States has no business supporting the Contras. There are simply too many questions about the Contras relating to their political viability, adherence to democracy, military performance, respect for human rights, and regional support to invest heavily in them.

G. WE DISAGREE WITH THE PREOCCUPATION OF U.S. POLICY ON NICARAGUA BECAUSE IT MEANS WE ARE NEGLECTING OTHER SERIOUS FOREIGN POLICY CONCERNS

Our preoccupation, indeed obsession, with Nicaragua represents a gross distortion of United States priorities. We are neglecting United States-Soviet relations. We are neglecting arms control. We are neglecting other priorities in the hemisphere.

Today, the debt crisis, problems of poverty and the impact of falling oil prices are matters of extraordinary importance for U.S. policy in Latin America. Yet, these vital issues get little attention of U.S. policymakers who, following the lead of our President, are fixated on the Contra war;

United States support for the new and fragile democracies in the region—Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, Guatemala, and several others—is far more important for United States policy than a war against the Sandinistas which these democracies do not support. The Contra war places a strain on what should be close ties in a community of democracies in the western hemisphere;

We would do well to remember the size and significant of Nicaragua in the life of Latin America. Nicaragua represents less than 1 percent of the population and less than one-half of 1 percent of the GNP of Latin America. The cost to Mexico alone of falling oil prices in the past few weeks exceeds Nicaragua's GNP by a factor of more than 2;

Over 150 United States companies have bigger annual sales than Nicaragua's GNP. The United States is obsessed with a small, poor, and vulnerable State that many Americans would be hard-pressed to find on a map.

H. FINALLY, WE BELIEVE THE PRESIDENT'S REQUEST FOR $100 MILLION FAILS TO TAKE INTO ACCOUNT THE REACTION OF OUR ADVERSARIES

The record suggests that the large scale Soviet military and economic buildup in Nicaragua did not begin until right after the United States started the Contra war in December 1981. When the United States steps up its aid to the Contras, the Soviet Union and Cuba steps up their aid to the Sandinistas. What will the United States do if the Soviets and Cubans respond to this $100 million plan? The administration has not addressed that question.

Many Members have discussed the possibility of United States military intervention in Nicaragua in the future. A vote for the President's request today will lift restrictions on CIA participation in the Contra war and bring American military advisors onto the scene in Central America where they will train the Contras. We will then have an American military presence with the Contras.

The President has said that he does not plan to send United States troops to Nicaragua, and I take him at his word. But the announced goals of the President, and the President's commitment to those goals inevitably point in that direction if our next round of escalation cannot achieve its goals.

III. A BETTER U.S. STRATEGY

Mr. Chairman, the choice before members today is not the narrow choice we have been told of between funding the Contras and the triumph of communism in Central America. There is a third alternative, developing a more balanced policy toward Nicaragua.

United States policy toward Nicaragua should have three essential components: containment, carrots and sticks, and Contadora and the negotiating process.

First, United States policy should seek to isolate Nicaragua and contain the harmful effects of its present policies.

We should prevent the Soviet Union and its allies from developing or deploying an offensive military capability in Central America that directly threatens the United States, a capability that does not currently exist. The United States should state clearly its intent to remove such a threat, if necessary, by military action;

We should protect the security and territorial integrity of any State in Central America that is threatened by Nicaragua, acting in conformance with the charter of the Organization of American States and the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance;

We should pursue a strong regional policy of providing economic and military assistance to the democracies of Honduras, Costa Rica, El Salvador, and Guatemala to provide their people with an opportunity for better lives and to enable them to resist any attempt by Nicaragua to threaten or destabilize them;

We should provide consistent diplomatic support on behalf of the observance of human rights, and support for freely-elected political institutions throughout the region, in recognition of the fact that subversion feeds on repression; and

We should offer diplomatic and political support to the domestic, democratic opponents of the Sandinista government.

Second, United States policy toward Nicaragua should be based on a long-term strategy of carrots and sticks to wean that country from the Cubans and Soviets:

A. CARROTS

If Nicaragua takes positive steps, such as agreeing to a ceasefire, removing the foreign military presence in Nicaragua, stopping its material support of insurgencies, agreeing to reduce the size of its armed forces, respecting human rights, or making progress toward national reconciliation and a pluralistic democratic system, the United States should be prepared to take simultaneous steps in response. Appropriate steps might include:

Suspending U.S. military exercises in the region;

Resuming normal trade including the resumption of nondiscriminatory trade treatment (MFN status), the restoration of benefits under the generalized system of preferences and the restoration of Nicaragua's sugar quota;

Supporting multilateral and bilateral economic assistance for Nicaragua; and Supporting Nicaraguan participation in a regional development organization.

B. STICKS

If Nicaragua does not take positive steps to do these things we and Nicaragua's neighbors want, there are also steps we can take in concert with our friends in the hemisphere, including:

Get our allies in Japan and Western Europe, Nicaragua's largest trading partners now, to cut their trade with Nicaragua;

Get our allies to cooperate with us in stopping all bilateral assistance and blocking multilateral assistance to Nicaragua;

Impose tougher United States economic sanctions, including an assets freeze and a prohibition on financial transactions such as bank lending or those involving travel to Nicaragua;

Break diplomatic relations;

Work with our Latin American allies, especially our Central American neighbors, to isolate Nicaragua in regional affairs.

Such steps, however, can only be effective if taken together with our friends and allies. Unilateral sanctions have not and will not be effective. Allied cooperation will not be forthcoming unless the United States is pursuing negotiations on behalf of goals our allies view as legitimate.

Third, a policy of negotiation with Nicaragua offers a better means of protecting United States interests than current policy. The United States should pursue a policy of strong support for the Contadora negotiations and bilateral talks with Nicaragua in support of Contadora, as the Contadora governments have requested.

There are two caveats concerning a successful negotiating posture:

First, negotiations and the Contra war effort cannot be pursued simultaneously:

The Sandinistas will make no concessions if they are convinced the goal of U.S. policy is to overthrow them through military pressure;

The United States cannot fund the Contras whose purpose it is to overthrow the Sandinistas and claim to support, and persuade others that it does support, a negotiated settlement with the Sandinistas. United States funding of the Contras thus undermines the negotiating process.

Second, negotiations and the Contadora process cannot succeed in the absence of whole-hearted United States support:

Rhetoric alone is no measure of United States support for Contadora diplomacy;

Evidence suggests only lukewarm United States support for the Contadora process:

Contadora is a backburner policy priority compared to efforts to weaken and oust the Sandinista government;

The President's March 16, 1986 speech to the American people never mentioned the Contadora process, and emphasized instead a diplomatic approach which requires the Sandinistas to relinquish power;

Ambassador Shlaudeman, former United States Special Envoy for Central America, met with the Nicaraguan Ambassador just twice in the past year and in that time did not meet any high Nicaraguan officials;

The United States has yet to make public comments on Contadora's third draft treaty completed 6 months ago;

The United States has not detailed its criticisms of the Contadora treaty draft;

The United States continues to reject the immediate goal of a Contadora treaty: To end armed conflict in Central America and to accept the existence of the Government of Nicaragua if Nicaragua alters its foreign policies and begins to improve its domestic record.

This is the heart of the bargain in a Contadora Treaty.

CONCLUSIONS

Mr. Chairman, one premise of the proponents of this legislation is that if you do not support military assistance, United States policy will fail. In my view, the proponents of funding the Contras overestimate what military assistance will do and underestimate what creative diplomacy can achieve.

A vote for House Joint Resolution 540 today will not resolve the issue. The Congress, and the country, are simply too divided on this aspect of Central America policy to sustain the proposed military policy. A policy which is not sustainable cannot succeed.

A vote against House Joint Resolution 540 is a vote to concentrate United States energies and policy on those many aspects of Central America policy on which there is a consensus, building on that consensus in order to isolate and contain Nicaragua, working together with the democracies of Central and Latin America who oppose Nicaragua's policies but also oppose the Contra war.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot pursue a unilateral policy of promoting the Contra war and thereby trying to make Central America safe for democracy if those same democracies do not support United States policy.

I urge a vote against House Joint Resolution 540.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 11 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. HYDE. Just tell what you have in your hand.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. All right, I will do that.

I have in hand here a document which I have shown the gentleman in the well, which shows specifically where a Latin American official says privately that the United States should support the Contras although he cannot say it publicly. If the gentleman would like to see this, I will show it to him.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have heard repeatedly from high officials of our Government that leaders in Central and Latin America——

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I am going to recapture my time because I am limited. This dialog is useful, but show the gentleman the document. He is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee.

I would like to open my remarks with three quotes from these wonderful people in Managua. Let us try Foreign Minister Father Miguel D'Escoto:

> I believe that especially for Nicaraguans and also for any knowledgeable person, being in Leningrad is a kind of pilgrimage. One feels that one has come to a holy land * * *.

That was December 1981.

How about Interior Minister Tomas Borge:

> We say to our brother Arafat that Nicaragua is his land and the PLO cause is the cause of the Sandinistas.

July 22, 1980.

How about Interior Minister Tomas Borge again. He is very quotable:

> Our friendship with Libya is eternal * * *. Libya is a people which, in accord with our experience, has developed solidarity without frontiers.

That was September 1, 1984.

I do not expect this debate to change a single vote. I feel, as Simon Bolivar once said, "Plowing in the sea."

But this question is so important. Some things must be said for the record, not just for historians to look at, but I suggest our grandchildren some years from now might want to know which side of the barricades their grandfather or their grandmother was on, because, make no mistake, the barricades are in place, and they are a little too high to straddle.

Now, the liberal clergy, the trendy vicars, the networking nuns, the assorted concerned citizens have done their job very well, and there will be rejoicing tonight when the red lights flash on this board, I am sure.

But I want to make very clear where I stand.

Now, if you are looking for an excuse to pacify the trendy left, they are easy to find. I just warn you, though, if you use one of these excuses, most of the people advocating them thought anybody but the Shah would be an improvement in Iran, and they also thought Reaganomics would not work, either. So you be careful with some of these.

Now, No. 1: Why are we so concerned about a little country of 3 million people? That is what my friend from Indiana, for whom my respect is deep and profound and enduring, said, "How can they be a threat to us?"

I do not know how much the gentleman knows about cancer, but there is a little brown mole called a melanoma, and it starts very small but it soon metastasizes, and pretty soon it can bring death. I suggest to you that Costa Rica—you can practically spit in the Panama Canal from Costa Rica—is a very important, strategic place, and if you think the Sandinista Communists, a surrogate of a Soviet surrogate Cuba, are going to be indifferent to spreading revolution to her neighbors, you really haven't been paying attention.

"Now, the Contras can't win." Can the Mujahedeen win? Can the Sonn Sann democratic resistance that has to fight the Khmer Rouge, as well as fight the Vietnamese, win? How much territory do the Mujahedeen control or dominate? What big or little cities? But nobody says we should not help them. That is a liberal cause. You see, if the freedom fighters are eight time zones away from this hemisphere, they deserve support. But the closer you get, the more tepid becomes their enthusiasm for helping freedom fighters.

Let me quote from one of my heroes in foreign policy, STEPHEN SOLARZ. Now, he supported $5 million to the democratic resistance in Cambodia. Now, let me read what he says on whether or not they can win and whether it is worth it. I quote Mr. SOLARZ:

> There is no way the non-Communist resistance is ever going to force Vietnam out. That is clearly impossible. But what is possible is that an increasingly effective resistance by increasing the price Vietnam has to pay for their occupation of Cambodia might induce the Vietnamese to agree to a political settlement.

Not bad logic. And I give it to you for whatever use you choose to make of it in our own hemisphere.

The Contras are one element of a triad—military pressure, economic pressure, and diplomatic pressure. Those are the three elements that got Somoza out, and those three elements combined will get the Sandinistas out, or get them to the negotiating table doing what is necessary for their survival, but we will not have that if we eliminate the military leg of the triad.

Now, "the Contras are guilty of atrocities." The senior Senator from Tennessee said the Contras' brutality is far worse than that of the Sandinistas. Well, you pay your money and you get your choice. We understand. Certainly if I were a Sandinista, I would want to dress as a Contra and kill a few people. Then they would blame the Contras. There are credible reports revealing this Communist tactic. But if you want to talk about atrocities, read our own history—read about Andersonville, the prison in Georgia during the war between the States, what we did to our own people; read about Sherman's march to the sea; read about Mylai; go visit a jail in a modern city today and talk about atrocities and rapes and gang activities. We live in an imperfect world. When you are drowning, you do not ask the lifeguard to answer a quiz as to whether he is kind to dumb animals or whether he is in a state of grace. We live in an imperfect world. We did not ask Joe Stalin what kind of a guy he was when we shipped $13 billion over to him when we were fighting Hitler. We did not ask about the Gulag, God forbid.

The question is not whether the Contras are a worthy vessel for liberation; the question is, what kind of society do we want living on our borders?

Now, "We haven't negotiated enough," that is another one. That requires a childlike belief that Communists will negotiate away power because you ask them to. They do not want to share power; folks, they want to take power. That is the history of negotiating with Communists.

Now, "we have no business trying to overthrow a sitting government." But the Sandinista government is illegitimate. It lied to the OAS, it lied to us, it does not depend on the consent of the governed. We helped De Gaulle try to overthrow Vichy. We helped the Sandinistas try to overthrow Somoza. We had an Embassy there. We recognized Somoza. Lafayette, our great friend Lafayette, came over here and helped us overthrow a sitting government. So that is nonsense.

You must think Yalta and Helsinki were triumphs for human rights rather than betrayals, you have such faith in sitting and negotiating with Communists.

There are many categories of ignorance. There is voluntary ignorance: "Don't tell me, I don't want to know"; there is vincible ignorance: "I might learn if I did know the facts"; there is invincible ignorance: "I'll never know, no matter what you tell me"; and then there is cognitive dissonance: "I don't want to believe it, and I won't believe it and I refuse to believe it, no matter what the facts are."

And cognitive dissonance, that mouthful of a phrase, is what I think is operative on this issue.

The truth is that our friends on the left have a Will Rogers-in-reverse complex. They never met an anti-Communist they liked, whether it is Syngman Rhee, Chiang Kai-shek, Savimbi, Diem. To mention this is called redbaiting. Do not think Mr. Nixon's troubles did not start with his pursuit of Mr. Hiss. That anti-anticommunism extends down to Calero, Cruz, and Robelo.

"The army and the government in El Salvador are the bad guys; the Communist guerrillas are the good guys." Then you reverse that when you go into Nicaragua.

In October 1956, there were freedom fighters in Hungary. They were rolled over by Russian tanks because we were not there. Hungary was on the Soviet border.

In 1968, we had the Prague spring. There were freedom fighters in Czechoslovakia. They were crushed by Soviet troops, 200,000 of them, because it was on their borders. We were not there.

We have seen the rape of Poland since 1945, resulting from one of those great treaties called Yalta. They have a labor union—their leaders go to jail for it—Solidarity. The church is under siege there. But we cannot help them; that is way over there.

Well, Qadhafi said it. He said Nicaragua is on our doorstep; this is in our hemisphere, and the gentlemen on the left want us again to be mere spectators.

Force for liberation is different from force for subjugation. Does this need to be explained?

We have found some Nicaraguan people who would rather die on their feet rather than live on their knees. Have they not got a right to our support? I suggest they do!

I want to say that as the refugees stream north and as we are forced to avert our eyes from Europe and the Middle East, because that is the Soviet grand strategy, history, not Pat Buchanan, is going to assign to you Democrats the role of pallbearers at the funeral of democracy in Central America. That is not McCarthyism. That is called accountability.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH].

Mr. MCHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this resolution and urge its defeat.

We have once again reached a critical juncture in setting American policy in Central America. With our vote tomorrow, we will either move further down the road to military escalation, or, by rejecting the President's $100 million request for Contra aid, we will signal our belief that there is a more constructive way to advance American interests in the region.

At the outset, let us be clear about one thing. A vote against Contra aid is not a sign of disinterest in Central America. The United States does have legitimate interests in the region—interests which are strategic, political, economic, and humanitarian.

We do have a strategic interest in preventing the establishment of Soviet bases or weapons in Central America which could threaten the security interests of the United States.

We do have a political interest in fostering democratic institutions and pluralism.

We do have an economic interest in seeing the nations of that region grow and develop in an equitable fashion.

And we do have a humanitarian interest in seeing all the people of Central America delivered from desperate lives of poverty and repression.

These are legitimate American interests, and they are shared by our friends and neighbors in the area.

Thus, the debate is not about whether we have interests in the region; the debate is about the most effective way of promoting the interests which we and our friends hold in common.

The President believes that substantially increasing aid to the Contras is the most effective way of advancing our goals. I don't question his sincerity, but I do question his judgment. And so do our friends in the region, and so do a clear majority of Americans.

There are precious few, if any, of our Latin friends who support our policy of military escalation. Indeed, most have publicly condemned it. How can such a policy be effective if the very friends who share our interests, and who have at least as great a stake in their advancement, oppose our policy? By this policy we are isolating the United States, not Nicaragua.

And how can such a policy be effective if a majority of Americans don't support it? In a democracy like ours, no government policy can long be sustained without public understanding and support.

The President has called upon all of his powers of persuasion to convince our people that the Nicaraguan Government is a cancer threatening the very lifeblood of our Nation, and that the Contras are freedom fighters who share our values and deserve our support. Yet, we all know that our constituents are not convinced. Under these circumstances, the President's policy is simply not sustainable and will not work.

In this matter, I believe that the judgment of our people and our friends is wiser than the President's. They recognize that a nation of less than 3 million people, a nation wracked with poverty, poses no direct threat to the United States. They know that the Contras, whose top military command is led by former members of Somoza's National Guard, do not readily qualify as political and spiritual descendants of our Founding Fathers.

The American people and our friends in the region have also been confused by the President's statements and goals. At first he claimed that support for the Contras was to interdict arms flowing to the rebels in El Salvador. But on other occasions he said its purpose was to put pressure on the Nicaraguans to negotiate. In his most strident moments, he has called it necessary to excise the Sandinista cancer from Central America. These statements have made people uncertain about the real goals of the President's policy. Moreover, they ask, if the Nicaraguan Government is truly a direct threat to the security interests of the United States, how can we expect the vastly outnumbered Contras to protect us? Why doesn't the President honestly acknowledge that American forces will be required? The positions taken by the President on these matters appear inconsistent to our people and our friends. This is not a sound basis on which to build a strong and sustainable policy.

What, then, shall our policy be?

If we have legitimate interests in Central America, it's not enough to simply reject the President's initiatives, particularly if we have real concerns and differences with the Sandinista government. While that government doesn't pose a direct threat to American vital interests now, we are concerned that it not allow the installation of Soviet offensive weapons, that its territory not be used to subvert its neighbors, and that its people have an opportunity to enjoy the democracy and pluralism they were promised. These are issues we and our friends have a right to pursue with the Sandinista government, and we should do so.

Unfortunately, our administration has never given serious negotiations a fair chance. While paying lipservice to the Contadora process, the focus of American policy has always been on military confrontation. This helps to explain why the American people and our Latin friends have resisted the policy. Military confrontation should be a last resort, not a first resort. If the President really wants an effective, sustainable policy, one which can enjoy broad public support, he must emphasize regional negotiations as his first priority.

If this resolution is defeated, as I hope it will be, I call upon the President to objectively reassess his policy and to seriously support the peaceful initiatives of our Latin friends who desperately want political dialog rather than military escalation. If the President does that, he can begin to construct the type of broad bipartisan support he needs here at home, and the kind of regional cooperation American policy must have to be successful.

I urge the defeat of this resolution, and the formulation of a new, constructive, truly bipartisan policy for our Nation.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McHUGH. I am happy to yield, if I have the time.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman mentioned before that he did not believe that Nicaragua with a population of only 3 million people could represent a significant military threat to the United States.

I wonder what the gentleman would say about Cuba. First we have a Cuba with significant military resources there. Now we have a Nicaragua, a launching pad for Nicaragua.

What kind of a threat realistically can Nicaragua bring to our hemisphere?

I say I disagree strongly with what the gentleman has said, because I think it can be substantial, given the efforts of the Soviets, of the PLO, of the Libyans in that area, not to export peace, not to come to a positive conclusion in their discussions, but to export terror in that part of the world.

I would like to ask the gentleman just a single question, and perhaps it comes as a result not just of what the gentleman has said, but what other speakers before have said, and that is if those discussions fail, which the gentleman seriously seems to believe are lacking, then what? What would the gentleman be willing to support? What would the people on the gentleman's side of the aisle be willing to support?

Mr. McHUGH. First of all, as I made very clear, I think we have a legitimate interest in preventing Nicaragua from being used as a base either to threaten the United States militarily or to subvert our neighbors in the region.

I think we must take those issues up with the Sandinistas.

There is no evidence at the moment that the Sandinista government has permitted the installation of any weapons which would threaten the security interests of the United States in any direct fashion. Therefore, I think it is inappropriate and counterproductive to be pursuing as a first resort this military policy of escalation which we are following.

I would like to answer the gentlewoman's question. Therefore, if the President wants broad public support, both here and in Central America, I think the first priority should be to undertake serious negotiations, which in my judgment and, I think, in the judgment of most Americans and most people in Central America the President has not done as a first priority. If those negotiations are undertaken in a serious and meaningful way and if the Sandinista government not only refuses to negotiate in a serious fashion, but then introduces the kinds of weapons which would directly threaten the security interests of the United States, I think the President would have broad support from this Congress and from this country for a military response in defense of our own security interests; but that is not the situation we are facing today. That is why the people of our country and our friends in Central America do not support the President's policy. It is not working. It is not sustainable. It is putting military escalation before the negotiating process, which I think most people expect first.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I would just simply like to say in response to that answer that what the gentleman essentially is saying is that if they do not resolve themselves through legitimate discussions, then we need to intervene militarily, and I would have to disagree strongly with the gentleman, because I think that it is the responsibility of the people from Nicaragua, the Contras who are trying to fight to restore some democracy in that area to be the first ones on the line, instead of our kids.

I think that is essentially what the gentleman is saying, either/or. That does not give us any alternative, assuming all the premises of what the gentleman has said are correct, and I do not accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. McHUGH] has expired.

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman.

Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McHUGH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to respond to some of the comments the gentleman from New York has made.

No. 1, there have been extensive efforts on negotiations, both bilateral and multilateral, supported time and time again by the United States.

I met earlier today with Philip Habib, who just completed a tour of the democratic countries in the region. He reported to me on a personal basis that in their own way the heads of states of each of those countries indicated support for continued pressure on the Sandinistas, a barrier to prevent the Sandinistas to come to their country, a pressure to keep them from consolidating their power in their regime. In a way that he came back and was able to report to the President that there is support in the region for the kind of policies to bring the Sandinistas to the table.

Do we have to wait until the Mig's are at the airstrip? We know these Nicaraguan pilots have been trained. Let us not wait until it is too late. Let us get the situation solved now.

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MONSON].

Mr. MONSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, having spent 2 days last week in Nicaragua and El Salvador, I cannot say that I learned everything there is to know about this important issue, but I can say that I learned some very important things.

During that time we had the opportunity of meeting with the newspaper people from La Prensa, the only independent newspaper left in the country. In that meeting we learned that there is no freedom of the press. Forty to eighty-five percent of that paper on a daily basis is censored by the Government. No blank spaces can be left in the paper. Many times that censorship comes after their deadlines and they then have to work diligently to put out their paper at a reasonable time.

We met with the independent Human Rights Commission formed during the Somoza years to investigate incidents where human rights were being violated and we learned from this group that as bad as things were under Somoza, things are worse now, that the human rights violations are continuing to increase and that those increases are coming from the Sandinista government and not from the Contras.

We met with a group of businessmen and labor leaders who were steadfast in their resolution that something must be done to turn this around. They begged us not to leave them without hope. These are people many of whom have lost their businesses because of confiscation by the Government, have lost their farms, have lost their ability to make their living.

We learned that the only people who are being given opportunities are the select few from within that Government, people like the President, who can afford to spend $3,500 on designer eyeglasses in New York City, five to seven times more than many of the people in Nicaragua make in 1 year.

We met with Cardinal Obando y Bravo, who told us that there is no freedom of religion.

We learned on February 28 of this year that a family was shot by the Sandinista government forces while praying in their home in an effort to practice their religion the way they saw fit to do so.

We were told that the Government instructs the military to not allow the practice of religion other than in the churches.

These brave people are not opposed to the Sandinistas because of who they are, but because of what they do. Their only interest is providing a better way of life for their fellow countrymen. They want freedom and opportunity which they all acknowledged is diminishing worse now than before under Somoza.

We were told by the Government themselves that they are not involved in the export of arms, that there are no foreign people flying the helicopters and using other military hardware that they have there, in straight contradiction to what our own intelligence sources tell us. In short we learned that the Vice President of Nicaragua, acting as President, can sit across the table from nine Members of the United States Congress and lie.

We went to El Salvador and there we were told that the only people who are opposing the negotiation process to lead to a peaceful resolution in this region is the Sandinista government.

We were told that for appearance sake and propaganda they will create a border incident on one of their borders and then rush in to negotiate with that country, one on one, so that it appears that they are willing to negotiate. Unfortunately they will not negotiate with all countries in the region.

We were told that the only way that this is going to be resolved is to keep the pressure on this Government by the Contras, because the negotiation process is not working, because the Sandinistas will not participate in it. Those in El Salvador acknowledged that pressure by revolutionary forces in El Salvador has increased significantly during the time the Contras have been left without military assistance.

So I ask after learning all of this why is it that the people who oppose this aid are so willing to assist the Communist government known as the Sandinistas? Why is it that when they acknowledge that the Communist Sandinistas are not good they will still oppose efforts to change that Government? Like it or not, that is exactly what is happening. If we do not provide this aid and help those who are fighting to keep communism out of this hemisphere we help those who are Communist and want to solidify and spread their influence throughout this region.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES].

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the President's request for additional funding for the Contras.

I do so because I believe that nothing which has occurred in Nicaragua in the past 4 years can by any stretch of the imagination be said to affect the vital interests of the United States.

I do so because I believed it wrong for the United States to instigate and finance a civil war in 1981—when our national interest was not threatened—and I believe it wrong today.

I do so not because I have any sympathy for the Sandinistas, but because I am convinced that those who would replace them will not further human rights or bring democracy to Nicaragua.

I do so because I believe that the CIA should have no further involvement in a suspect cause that can only lead to a lessening of its credibility. And subject it to continual public criticism.

And I rise in opposition to the request for humanitarian and military aid to the Contras because it simply won't work. It will not achieve any of the various goals the administration has propounded during the course of this war. Rather, a continuing and more deadly civil war will cause the Cubans and Russians to increase military and economic assistance, will provide a convenient excuse for the Sandinistas to institute further internal oppression, and will eliminate any chance of negotiated settlement.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that those zealots in the administration—like Mr. Buchanan—know all of this. They know the Sandinistas will not be overthrown by CIA-provided military aid or by so-called humanitarian aid. They know that respected leaders like Arturo Cruz are but figureheads in the Contra leadership and will have no power if the Contras were to win. They know that Cuban and Soviet involvement has increased primarily as a response to American intervention. And they know that the Nicaraguan economy—which, if permitted to continue its growth—might have led to a softening of Sandinista attitudes—began to crumble only after the CIA-funded civil war was well underway.

The administration knows all this—but persists. It persists apparently, not because it cares about Nicaragua or the fate of its people: rather, it speaks of East-West power politics, of standing up to the Russians once and for all, of keeping Marxism-Leninism out of the Americas. It speaks, as did the President Sunday night, with an inflamed rhetoric that bears no resemblance to the reality of events in Central America or of our relationship with the Soviets.

In sum, Mr. Chairman, the administration persists because it believes it is perfectly proper to foment war in Nicaragua if doing so sends a message to the Russians. Well, Mr. Chairman, to paraphrase General Marshall, it's the wrong message, at the wrong time, in the wrong place. And it's a message encumbered with some peculiar meanings: "Humanitarian aid" suddenly means boots, uniforms, and vehicles for an army in the field: "Freedom fighters" is a term used to describe those who burn crops, sabotage power grids, and execute prisoners. The latter are even equated with America's Founding Fathers and the French resistance.

We should not stand for this nonsense any longer, Mr. Chairman. We must instill some sense of reason and proportion in America's foreign policy. We should send a message of peace and economic development to our neighbors in Latin America. And, at a time when we are reducing funds for health care to expectant mothers, cutting back on programs to aid the handicapped, and eliminating any chance of decent housing or adequate education for many of our citizens, we can ill afford $100 million for the Contras.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOKES. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to Chairman STOKES that he has made a very and effective message, but he has couched it in the voice of reason and I want to applaud that, because it is very easy for people to get polemical out here on the floor. I know Nicaragua is going to send everybody to extremes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this resolution because its foundation is based on deceit, misrepresentations, and cover up; it is a policy which is wrong in the first place, a policy which is not in our long-term interests, and, as such, a policy which is ultimately doomed to fail.

The President's oft-stated charge against the Nicaraguan Government is that it is a "totaltiarian Marxist Dungeon," unconcerned with human rights and bent on militarily subverting the hemisphere. This is a propaganda campaign of the worst kind for it is creating a set of false beliefs that will lead us into a losing policy. Let us be quite clear about the falsehoods of the President's statements on this matter.

In Nicaragua there are no death squads. In United States-supported El Salvador, the right wing death squads have been responsible for the vast majority of the more than 40,000 civilian murders over the past 5 years.

In Nicaragua, the press has occasionally been censored. In El Salvador, opposition journalists have been murdered and their newspapers have been bombed into silence. Until Nicaragua has death squads like those of El Salvador, our claim to be fighting to restoring civil rights in Nicaragua is tranparently disingenuous.

Nicaragua is not totalitarian. In the internationally monitored elections last November, 80 percent of the population turned out to vote—as compared to 53 percent in the United States—for seven different politicla parties who now hold seats in the National Assembly. In Nicaragua these parties were given public financing and free television and radio time but there were, regretably occasional restrictions. In El Salvador, by contrast, opposition leaders are often tortured and murdered and in its last election voting was mandatory and the ballots were place in transparent ballot box and monitored by the El Salvadoran military.

With 60 percent of the Nicaraguan economy in private hands, it is not a Marxist economy, albeit further to the left than our own. But neither God nor the last U.S. election gives us the right to kill our neighbors if they do not copy our economy.

In the past 5 years, the Nicaraguan Government has brought down illiteracy from 55 percent to 13 percent and, by nearly every objective measure of human rights, has demonstrated that it is much more concerned with the welfare of its people than are the Governments of El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras. This is not to say that the Sandinistas abuses are justifiable—they are not. Yet there are far worse abuses in the region that we ignore.

The charge that Nicaragua is bent on military subverting the region is also without factual basis. After 4 years of spending over $100 million to fund the Contras for the alleged purpose of interdicting arms, not one single cache of weapons has been interdicted. Furthermore, Nicaragua has agreed through the Contadora process to meet every stated security concern of the administration's including a withdrawal of all foreign military advisers and support if the administration would stop the undeclared war against Nicaragua. Yet, the administration blocked this Contadora process giving no intelligible reason as to why.

Finally, if we ever really have a legitimate security threat, we have the most effective military tool to deal with it: we have control over the seas.

Every premise about the need for a war against Nicaragua is based on lies and deceptions which provide a pretext for imposing the type of government that the administration wants to see in Nicaragua. It is wrong, it won't work and I am tired of the deception, my constitutents are tired of the deception and the American people, by at least 70 percent, are tired of the deception.

For over 133 years, we have opposed in Central America every move for social reform. Here again we are trying to impose our kind of government in Nicaragua for dubious reasons. Let us not fool ourselves as to what funding for the Contras really is: it is imperialism. Only now we are doing it by illegally mining harbors, distributing manuals of death, and by funding former Somoza national guardsmen who make up 46 of the 48 leadership positions within the Contras.

It is time to stop the rhetoric, cut off the hired army for good, practice what we preach and butt out. It serves our military, economic, and human interests to make friends among our neighbors. A good place to start is to stop attacking them. Better if they say "amigo" than "uncle."

The administration's proposal to resume funding to the Contras epitomizes everything that is working with our Nicaraguan policy. The Contras have been a tragedy for the Nicaraguan people, who, according to every independent human rights group, have been systematically brutalized and murdered by the Contras. Moreover, the Contras will not be able to succeed in imposing a different Government in Nicaragua, a point which is now conceded even by our own commanders, including General Gorman. Finally, it will backfire in terms of isolating us from the Contadora countries who oppose the Contra funding. It will also confirm in the minds of the Nicaraguan people their beliefs about U.S. imperialism making possibilities for the future friendship between our two people less likely.

Until there is a peaceful settlement, and aid will only prolong the murder and mayhem. Once there is a cease-fire and negotiations begin, then we should be dealing with the question of refugee resettlement. First, however, we must stop contributing, directly or indirectly, to the creation of these refugees.

Mr. STOKES. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Chairman, I urge a vote against the President's request.

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARTNETT].

Mr. HARTNETT. I thank the gentleman from New Mexico for giving me a few moments here.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am going to leave the Congress of the United States this year, and I will close 6 years of service here, probably not even recognized by the majority of the people I represent. They will often wonder, I guess, what I did here in 6 years. I guess being a minority Member, it is very difficult to really accomplish anything meaningful in a short period of time.

But I can tell you this: The privilege that I have to stand here today is the highlight of my 6 years to this point in time. I have a chance, really, for the first time in the service that I have been privileged to render to the people of the First District of South Carolina an opportunity to maybe, just maybe, make a difference.

My colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] this morning said, "You do not have a right to judge me. History will judge me," and he was never more correct in his statement. History is going to judge not only him and his remarks, but all of my colleagues here, and me, too.

I hope that if just for one fleeting moment one of my children or grandchildren decide to look back through the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when their grandfather or father was a Member to the debate on whether or not we, the United States—and this is the question—whether or not we were going to tolerate communism, with all its inherent problems in this hemisphere, or whether we were not.

So, children, as you read this RECORD maybe long after I am gone, remember it was your father or your grandfather or your great grandfather who, even though he was probably one of the least important and will be the least remembered Members of this body, at least he stood here and said to his colleagues in this body, "Gentlemen, you are either for the Communists or you are for the freedom fighters." A Congress that is unwilling to send Redeye missiles in the defense of democracy in Nicaragua will be unwilling to send red-blooded American boys to the defense of liberty in Mexico and, yes, maybe even Texas.

If you are unwilling to send $100 million reprogrammed dollars to stop communism in this hemisphere, do not, my fellow Americans, expect this same Congress to commit red-blooded American boys.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I only have 4 minutes. I have heard all I need to hear from the gentleman from Michigan in this debate.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield.

Mr. Chairman, the time now is to vote. If you are not with the anti-Communist forces, then I and all of America have to assume you are with the Communist forces. And if you are unwilling to say we are going to have an apocalypse for communism in Nicaragua, if you are unwilling to say that, then where will you say that—Honduras, Guatemala, Mexico, Brownsville, TX, Cheyenne, WY, Montreal, Canada?

We are the last force strong enough to hold back the strengthening military might of Nicaragua in this whole hemisphere, and if we do not do it now by aiding the Contras who are fighting and giving their lives, I do not think it is ever going to stop, because you will be unwilling to commit American forces to stop it anywhere in this hemisphere.

I am just asking those of you who might be reading this page 30 years from now, remember who it was who said no to communism in this hemisphere, and remember who it was who turned their backs on those fighting for freedom.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me. I rise in strong opposition to the President's request for $100 million in aid to the Contras.

Mr. Chairman, I have some trepidation about addressing the Chamber at this particular time because I cannot really feel that what most of us say is going to change very many minds. What we are doing here is going through an exercise, getting a little practice, for what we are going to say to our constituents when we go back home and defend the vote that we cast.

I think this is useful. In fact, I intend to utilize my time for that very purpose. I intend to make aid to the Contras an issue in my district. I believe that it will be an issue for the next several years, as it has been for the past several years. The American people need to understand this issue in all of its complexity. Much of the debate here tends to oversimplify things a little bit.

I am just going to try to make a couple of points. The first is that the attitude of Latin Americans regarding U.S. intervention in this region of Central America is a very strong, emotional attitude. There is probably no stronger common bond among the countries of Latin America than their fear and hatred of U.S. intervention in their affairs. This attitude is based upon generations of experience with such intervention, interspersed with periods of benign neglect, or occasional idealistic or pragmatic overtures aimed at providing some small, concrete assistance in achieving progress in their economic, social, and political system.

The Alliance for Progress under Kennedy was an example of such a positive, although short-lived initiative. The report of the Kissinger Commission in this administration was an example of understanding and good intentions. Neither of these produced substantial results, however.

The history of our direct intervention in Latin America, which is on the minds of all of us during this debate, is most colorfully illustrated by the words of Gen. Smedley Butler before a congressional committee 50 years ago. General Butler retired as Commandant of the Marine Corps. He has been frequently quoted on this matter, and I would just like to quote him one more time.

He said:

I spent 33 years and 4 months in active service as a member of our country's most agile military force—the Marine Corps. I served in all commissioned ranks from a second lieutenant to major general. And during that period I spent most of my time being a high-class muscle man for Big Business, for Wall Street and for the bankers. In short, I was a racketeer for capitalism.

I helped make Mexico and especially Tampico safe for American oil interests in 1914. I helped make Haiti and Cuba a decent place for the National City Bank boys to collect revenues in. I helped in the raping of half a dozen Central American republics for the benefit of Wall Street. The record of racketeering is long. I helped purify Nicaragua for the international banking house of Brown Brothers in 1909–12. I brought light to the Dominican Republic for American sugar interests in 1916. I helped get Honduras "right" for American fruit companies in 1903. In China in 1927 I helped see to it that Standard Oil went its way unmolested.

Now that is the picture which Latin American carries to this day of the United States' role. Believe me, I have talked to as many of the political leaders in Latin America as most of us have. I have spent my entire life living on the Mexican border. I represent a 25-percent Hispanic population, and I think I have some sensitivity to these attitudes. There is no one that I have talked to who does not indicate that our intervention through the Contras or through direct military intervention would be the end of any possibility of constructive relationships with Latin America as far into the future as we can see.

We sometimes forget that the Sandinistas get their name from a great Nicaraguan patriot, Augusto Cesar Sandino who was killed fighting the Marine occupation of his country in 1934.

The present generation of Americans and their Congressmen have difficulty in understanding the emotional content of Nicaragua and other Latin countries' attitudes toward our efforts to dictate to them how they shall conduct their affairs.

I believe that we should be farsighted enough to perceive how these attitudes will affect our alliances in the region, and ultimately our ability to influence developments vital to our own security.

Certainly we should be able to understand why no leader of a Latin American country will publicly support the Presidents Contra did program, regardless of the private hints he may give to friendly State Department officials.

And it is even easier to understand how every Latin American leader will tell even a visiting U.S. Congressman as they have told me, that direct U.S. military intervention in Nicaragua will produce a generation of hatred for U.S. throughout all of Latin America.

Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues, and I ask this administration, will our security as a nation be enhanced by the alienation of all of our friends in Latin America? Do we want to hand Cuba and the Soviets their biggest triumph in history, the triumph of driving a wedge between the United States and every country south of the Rio Grande?

I, for one, do not wish to embark on this course.

The second point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, has to do with our attitude toward Marxist ideology in our hemisphere. I use the term "Marxist ideology" as the broadest term to cover all of the wide variety of Communist and Socialist groupings in the Latin American countries. The President and his supporters have taken the politically simple and expedient course of lumping all of those tendencies together and creating the picture of an alien ideological invasion about to overwhelm the hemisphere.

The truth is more complex: the Nicaraguan Communist Party was a nonplayer in the revolution that overthrew Somoza. In most Latin countries, the Soviet-dominated Communist Party is the most conservative of the revolutionary forces. This was incidentally, also the case in the Philippines, where the Soviet controlled Communist Party has actually faded into nonexistence. The Soviets entered the picture in Nicaragua when the Sandinista revolution succeeded, with help from Cubans, Europeans, other Latin Americans, and even the United States. The Nicaraguans turned to the Soviets for help, and received it. But they also turned to the European Community, and to every other available sympathizer. That still includes a great deal of private U.S. assistance. There are at least 1,000 U.S. citizens helping the Sandinistas in Nicaragua, and tens of thousands more raising funds to repair the destruction caused by the Contra forces. That number will increase substantially, as the United States is increasingly polarized by the Reagan doctrine of intervention in regional conflicts around the world.

We should not be surprised at Nicaragua accepting Soviet and Cuban help, nor should we be paranoid about it. We accepted Soviet help in defeating Hitler, and we won the Chinese Communist in an effort to control Soviet hegemony and to stabilize Asia.

There are Marxists, including Communists, in the governments of many of our allies. Some of these governments are our friends—are even controlled by Socialists. Even Canada has a major Socialist influence in its government, as have many Latin countries. The fact is that democratic socialism is a major competing ideology with democratic capitalism throughout the world, both developed and underdeveloped. Our policy posture must be to avoid the course that results in driving revolutionary forces into the most extreme of Marxist authoritarianism. We must help the democratic Socialist forces move toward economies of greater freedom, and preventing the excesses of right-wing dictatorships which call on our support because they are friendly to our corporate economic interests.

We are abdicating such a course now, to the destruction of our long-term security interests around the world. We are abdicating such a course because of the rigid ideological blinders worn by this administration, which renders it incapable of dealing with the realities of mixed economics, of nations seeking non-alignment between the super-powers, of nations who seek to mold a political, economic, and social system best suited to their own history and tradition.

I know we can do better. The first step must be to defeat this measure before us so that we can begin a new course based on cooperation with the Contadora nations and the Contadora support group. Only from such a new course can progress be made, and security for the hemisphere be obtained.

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] enter into a colloquy with me?

Mr. BROWN of California. I will be happy to on the gentleman's own time.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. It is on my time.

The gentleman mentioned Sandino. Did the gentleman know that Sandino's grandson, Arisa de Pavon, was in Washington a week ago, gave a press conference to which all of the media was invited but none came, and that he told that press conference that he was opposed to the Sandinista regime because it had thrown out the ideas of his grandfather and that they had locked him up for 3 years and threatened to kill him or imprison him for 30 years if he did not join their organization?

Mr. BROWN of California. In response to the gentleman's query, I will say I did not have that pleasure. But I noticed that our colleague from California, DAVID DREIER, yesterday mentioned that he had talked to Christina Chamorro, the editorial page editor of La Prensa about how she hated the Sandinistas, and yet her sister, Claudia Chamorro is the Nicaraguan Ambassador to Costa Rica. So we sometimes have interfamily differences of this sort.

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COLEMAN].

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, one of the things I find very troubling and somewhat misunderstood is exactly what the perception by the countries in Central America is of our own policy and whether or not they support it or not. Just a few minutes ago, we heard from the chairman of the Intelligence Committee. He said in these words, "Virtually no democratic nation in Latin America supports United States policy there." He went on further to say that "No Latin American publicly endorses our military aid in this area," that is, any leader of these countries.

Now I find that rather hard to believe when my President tells me that publicly these countries, indeed, do not support, and there is very little reason why we might guess why they might not support it publicly when they do not know whether or not the United States is going to be able to sustain and support these efforts, but that privately we have been told they do. In other words, their public posture is much different than their private misgivings and concerns about the Nicaraguans and support for our own policy.

I am not on the Intelligence Committee. I am not the chairman of the Intelligence Committee. But I went downstairs where there are experts from the intelligence community who are made available to every Member of this House this afternoon and tomorrow. These are not Republican or Democrat members of the intelligence community. But if you have any doubt about private misgivings about Nicaragua or private support for the United States position, I ask my colleagues to go downstairs to a room that you know about already, or the staff will tell you where, so that you might ask our intelligence-gathering apparatus exactly what the position of these countries are, because privately they are saying something differently than they are publicly. And I might say that it is very misleading to discuss this issue by continually drawing out the fact that publicly these people do not support us. That matters very little when you compare that to the private conversations and what they really say. I dare-say that there are Members of Congress that say things publicly and who believe something privately, differently as well.

Now I am amazed to find out we differ on the facts as much as we do. We might differ on the conclusions, but the facts about whether or not our policy in Central America is supportable or not really leaves a lot to be desired.

The previous speaker before me said it was absolutely totally opposed by everybody who lived down there. A Gallop poll taken at the end of 1985 by the Costa Rican affiliate of Gallop polls indicates that just the opposite seems to be the case. When asked what is the threat to Central America, it is an overwhelming response that these Latin American nations feel that Nicaragua is the threat to their country, followed by Cuba, followed by the Soviet Union, and barely a blip, hopefully that is the case, coming a very poor fourth is the United States. And I think that says a lot about what the public sentiment is down there, if not the public statements of the leaders of these countries.

I would like to go to the next chart. When asked who causes tension in Central America, again the same responses: Nicaragua, Cuba, U.S.S.R. overwhelmingly so. I think this is again showing the public sentiment for what our own activities are and our own policies are in Latin America.

But the final chart here I think is the one that we are all interested in today. That is, should the United States continue aiding the Nicaraguan resistance? Should the United States' policy that we are voting on tomorrow be continued, and you are sitting in Costa Rica, or Honduras, or Guatemala, or El Salvador, and you have that question asked of you privately, and what is your response? Your response is overwhelmingly yes. If they had the opportunity to be in this Chamber tomorrow to vote, 70 percent in neighboring Costa Rica would vote for the President's proposal, and equally across-the-board for every other close country in this region.

I think it is very important to consider this as we vote tomorrow.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MARTINEZ].

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Chairman, tomorrow culminates about 3 weeks of rhetoric that has been allowed to spin wildly into space. In bantering about communism, freedom, and Harlingen, TX, too many people in Washington have strayed dangerously far from the context of a small, poor Latin American country struggling with some very Latin American problems. If my colleagues will indulge me, I would like to bring this debate back to reality for a moment.

What we are really talking about is a policy for Nicaragua, yet many of us would let the elaborate staging and dramatic acting in Washington, DC, guide our decisions. Half-day trips to Nicaragua, Red Sea scenarios on television, and advertisements in major newspapers by political advocacy groups seem to be dominating this debate. By contrast, I would like to share with you some different perspectives by different people.

It isn't surprising that some have taken as fact that Nicaragua is inexorably transforming into a totalitarian state. But is this based more on observation of Nicaragua, or on United States politics? I received a letter recently from a respected attorney in California, Mr. Brad Seligman, who just returned from a trip to Nicaragua with the National Lawyers Guild. Their task was to study the content and process of drafting the new Nicaraguan constitution. They met with members of the government, opposition parties, La Prensa, Catholic and Evangelical churches, agricultural producers, and the judiciary. And unlike my colleagues last weekend, they stayed 2 weeks. I don't know how accurate their report is but in his letter to me he reflects a different perception, Mr. Seligman wrote:

> Our meetings and observations . . . convinced us that the Government of Nicaragua is firmly committed to democracy in general and a Democratic process in developing its constitution—> includes numerous protections of individual liberties, assures a mixed economy, incorporates norms of international law and provides for a democratic, pluralistic Government . . . A review of the draft constitution reveals the commitment of Nicaragua to a genuine democracy with checks and balances inherent in any country opposed to dictatorships. In addition, the constitution protects private property (over 80 percent of the land in Nicaragua is privately held), personal liberty, due process of law, equality of all people and dedication to democracy.

The draft constitution submitted to the legislative assembly on February 21, 1986—

Over a million copies of this constitution will be distributed to a country of 3 million people. Debate on each and every provision will occur through a series of over 80 open forums involving every sector and group in the country that wishes to participate. The deadline for a final draft of the constitution is next October, 2 years after the election. Now, whether this constitution will rigidly govern the activities of the Sandinista regime is questionable. But we are certainly not going to bring pressure on them to abide by their constitution by fueling a civil war in their country.

I would like to share with you part of another letter I received which I personally feel is accurate about this civil war, from mothers whose sons have been killed in it:

> The so-called humanitarian aid to the Contras has brought nothing in its wake but pain, suffering and children without parents.
>
> Members of Congress, Nicaraguan mothers do not want more tragedy. Our hearts are broken and our eyes are full of tears because of this foul and evil Contra invasion.
> We would call it humanitarian aid if the dollars were invested to improve developing countries, to protect children the world over from dying of starvation or to build hospitals.
>
> We who write you suffer the consequences of this war in our own flesh. Our sons have been victims of this so-called humanitarian aid.
> Our hearts are filled with sorrow. We only ask you to be compassionate with our people and grant that this aid be invested elsewhere; not in our killing.

Over the last 5 years, over 13,000 civilians have died in the fighting—the proportional equivalent of twice the number of deaths the United States suffered in World War II. The Contras have concentrated their efforts against programs established to ameliorate the hardships of rural workers. The only effect of this is to intensify the country's extreme poverty and to strengthen the hand of the government.

The Contras are not going to win. The two former chiefs of United States Southern Command said they cannot win. After 5 years of fighting with United States taxpayers' money, they do not hold a single town in Nicaragua. What have they done? They have encouraged the Sandinistas to crack down on civil rights and to import more Soviet, Cuban, and East European weapons and advisers. Three House committees have cited this in their rejection of the President's request. The administration cries out about these results also, then tries to produce more of them.

What about the other Latin American countries? Almost every one of them opposes aiding the Contras. Eight foreign ministers of democratic Latin nations came to Washington recently to convince the President not to request this aid. This week, the Brazilian Government took exception to comments made by our President Sunday night about Sandinista activities in Brazil. We are alone in our policy in Latin America. If the administration claims that Latin leaders privately support aiding the Contras, the burden of proof lies on the administration's shoulders. As popularly elected Representatives, it would be an act of hypocrisy for us to accept such claims which, aside from being unsubstantiated, Latin leaders cannot say before their own constituencies.

Finally, I would like to share with my colleagues a letter I wrote to the President last month with the able help of a fellow Hispanic, Segundo Mercado-Llorens, and which was cosigned by three of my colleagues, ROBERT GARCIA, BILL RICHARDSON, and EDWARD ROYBAL. The letter stated that the President's request for more aid to the Contras raises serious questions about his commitment to the Contadora process, especially in light of the recent Caraballeda and Guatemala statements, both of which call for an end to external support for irregular military and insurrectionist forces in Central America. I will quote from our letter:

> In your June 11, 1985 letter to (a representative of this House), you wrote that you were exploring "how and when the United States would resume useful direct talks with Nicaragua" * * *. This letter held out the promise of a diplomatic initiative that we felt would help bring peace to the troubled region. Indeed, in authorizing the $27 million in aid, Congress called on you to resume bilateral negotiations without preconditions. However, your November 6th report on Nicaragua stated that bilateral talks undermined the Contadora process, and that Costa Rica, Honduras and El Salvador did not favor such negotiations. But the adoption of the January 14 Guatemala declaration by each of these governments indicates that this is no longer the case.

We believe that the recent initiatives in Guatemala, which call for pluralistic democracy, for observance of human rights, and for withdrawal of foreign troops in the region, accurately reflect what should be the goals of the United States in Central America. In so doing, they provide us with an opportunity to move this region toward the stability critical to our national security, and vital to the long-term peace, prosperity and freedom of our hemisphere.

We then asked the President to:

First, suspend requests for futher assistance to the Contras until the progress made in these new Contadora initiatives toward a balanced and verifiable settlement in the region may be evaluated;

Second, resume bilateral negotiations with the Government of Nicaragua;

Third, declare U.S. Government willingness to sign a protocol, guaranteeing the rights of all parties in the region should they agree on a peace treaty; and Fouth, support the creation of a bipartisan congressional delegation which would consult with the President on a regular basis and with the Contadora nations, as to how the United States could best advance the process for a regional peace.

Such proposals, I hope, will help bring this debate back down to Earth. We must stop looking at Nicaragua with ideological blinders on. We must cease to ignore the calls of our Latin American allies. If we vote to fund the Contra war, the Red Sea in Central America may soon be the blood of American soldiers.

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. McCOLLUM].

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, the debate on the issues surrounding whether the United States should provide military assistance to the Nicaraguan Contras are quite simple and straightforward. Virtually everyone admits that the Government of Nicaragua is a Communist dictatorship, that it has close ties and receives weapons and support from the Soviet Union, Cuba, Communist east bloc countries, Libya, the PLO and assorted other terrorist organizations.

□ 1410

Although there may be some dispute on the specifics, there is general agreement that the Communist government in Nicaragua has been a chronic violator of human rights and has suppressed democracy and democratic ideals.

There is very little dispute that the Sandinista Communists support Communist guerrillas in El Salvador and other countries neighboring Nicaragua. Just last Friday the Washington Post in its editorial said:

There is no good reason to doubt the Sandinistas are revolutionary Communists, who would if they could make their country a second Cuba: A police state and an outpost of Soviet power * * * Their subversive capability is evident * * *.

* * * The United States needs to do what is necessary to block and defeat efforts by Nicaragua, with or without its Soviet patrons, to subvert other Central American countries.

We all know that the Salvadoran guerrilla Communists have been given support by the Nicaraguans since the revolution in Nicaragua in 1979. At this present time, the two key command centers of the Salvadoran resistance guerrilla forces fighting the democracy of President Duarte in El Salvador are housed in Nicaragua.

At the present time, the leadership of the Communist guerrillas fighting against democracy in El Salvador are housed, personally, in Managua.

At the present time, Radio Vinceramos is housed in Nicaragua, spreading the revolution to the neighboring countries.

Following the quotes that have been given to us on many past occasions by the Nicaraguan Communist leaders themselves such as in Commandante Arce's famous speech in 1984 in which he said: "We'll never give up our revolutionary friends and we'll never stop going into our neighboring countries" and Thomas Borge's famous 1983 interview in an American magazine in which he stated, "The prophecy of Ronald Reagan was right about one thing, that we are going to see revolution carried from Nicaragua into Guatemala into Honduras and El Salvador and into Mexico."

Most recently, in December of this past year, a Russian-made car transporting weapons of various assortments in hidden, specially made compartments was found in Honduras, going between Nicaragua and El Salvador.

In Honduras nearly 2 years ago, nearly 100 people were captured who were from Honduras originally, put in there to have violence and revolution in Honduras. They said, they testified—the ones that survived the capture—that they were recruited in Honduras by the Nicaraguan Sandinista Communists; that they were sent to Cuba for training; they were brought back to Nicaragua for more training, and then they were shipped after they were armed into the neighboring country of Honduras.

Most recently, you will all remember last year when the M-19 forces invaded in Colombia and took over the State Palace of Justice there, when quite a number of judges were killed. There is irrefutable evidence that the arms were supplied intentionally for that maneuver by the Nicaraguan Communists.

Now, it does not make a lot of sense to me to debate that issue any longer.

The real debate is not over whether the United States should act to stop the Nicaraguan Communists from becoming another Cuba and subverting their neighbors, but it is over what actions we should take—what the remedy should be. There are three choices:

First, continue efforts toward a negotiated settlement;

Second, adopt a policy of containment; and

Third, support the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters in an effort to force a settlement on the Nicaraguan Communists or bring about their downfall.

Logic says that the chances of either of the first two choices succeeding are very remote and highly improbable. The third choice, aid to the Contras is not without peril, but it is the only one of the three choices where there is any reasonable basis to hope for success. The consequences of failure are so dire, I don't see how anyone in good conscience can opt for anything but the course of action that has the best chance of success.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield an additional minute to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, talk is cheap. In the 7 years they have been in power the Nicaraguan Communists have done a lot of talking about a negotiated settlement and said they embrace the Contadora process, but time and again they have rebuffed every serious proposal to bring about a settlement that would be acceptable to the United States and their neighbors. With their military strength growing with each passing day and their regime consolidating more and more from within as a solid Communist state, how much longer can we afford to play their game of negotiating? Up until now it has been nothing but a stall for time on their part. Based on the history of our efforts to negotiate with other Communist regimes, why should we reasonably expect anything different from any future negotiations with the Nicaraguan Communists? To do nothing else but continue negotiations simply plays into the hands of the Communists.

Containment at best is never a good policy. It does not present any hope or opportunity for changing the internal politics of a Communist country. To follow a policy of containment means that in the case of Nicaragua, we are conceding the future of thousands of Nicaraguans to Communist dictatorship and chronic human rights abuses. In this case, though, there is even a worse problem with the policy of containment. It is not practical. Nicaragua has so many porous land borders, and no one has ever been successful in containing Communist subversive activities in Democratic countries nearby even when the Communist country is an island state like Cuba. If we pursued a policy of containment, we would have to appropriate millions of dollars to beef-up the armed forces of neighboring countries and still in all probability we would fail to contain the Communist revolutionaries.

This brings us to the only real option we have left: Aid to the Nicaraguan Contras. Although they can only muster weak and ineffective arguments on behalf of other choices, opponents argue that aid to the Contras is not a realistic option and has no better and probably less of a chance of success. First, they argue that the Contra freedom fighters cannot bring about the downfall of the Nicaraguan Communist regime even with the $100 million of aid the President requests. They say that this is the President's real goal, but that the general populace of Nicaragua does not support the Contras and that the lack of success in the last few years has demonstrated that they cannot win. No one can be certain that with the aid requested for the Contras, the Contras can bring about the fall of the Communist government, but there is much more to support the likelihood of their success in this regard than there is in support of the arguments that they can't win. The revolutionary movement against the Communists did not start in earnest until 1982, and the United States only gave them a small amount of initial funding before Congress cutoff all support and then just a few months ago agreed to give a paltry sum of humanitarian nonmilitary aid. Against the largest army that has ever been assembled in Central America, equipped with the latest in Soviet weaponry, including gunship helicopters, how could we have expected the Contras to do any better than they have? In fact, the surprising thing is that the Contras have survived and thrived during the past few months. The reason for this is very clear: The Contras do have the support of a large portion of the disenchanted populace of Nicaragua, especially peasant farmers who do not at all like the collectivist policies of the Sandinista Communists. In fact, the bulk of the Contra Army is made-up of these peasant farmers. With the aid requested by the President, the Contras could acquire the necessary missiles and sophisticated weapons to eliminate the advantage given the Nicaraguan Communists by the Soviet weaponry and would be given a tremendous boost psychologically among their troops and in the eyes of the general populace in Nicaragua. Whether this would be sufficient to topple the Communist regime in Managua is not clear, but what is clear is the incorrectness of the arguments that the Contras with the aid requested are sure to fail. They would have a reasonable chance to actually overthrow the Communist government, and even falling short of that would bring tremendous pressure on the Sandinista regime to get serious about a negotiated settlement.

Opponents of aid to the Contras argue that if the Contras start showing signs of success with additional United States aid, this will only cause the escalation of support to the Communist Nicaraguans by Cuba and the Soviet Union and that the Communist government of Nicaragua will enormously step up its support of Communist guerrillas in the neighboring countries. While Cuba and the Soviet Union may, indeed, attempt to bolster their support for their Communist allies, it is highly improbable that they would risk a direct confrontation with the United States by deploying their own forces, or any heavier equipment than they have already supplied and any other additional support would be of questionable relative value in the conflict. In the meantime, the Nicaraguan Communists would have a hard time seriously escalating subversive activities next door when being faced with a much greater threat at home from the Contras. Thus, it can clearly be seen that the logic for aiding the Contras outweighs the arguments of the opponents against it on the basis of its chances for success.

The second major argument opponents of aid to the Contras make is that they are led by former Somozan national guardsmen, who are worse violators of human rights than the Communist regime in power, and would not be any better in power than the present regime and possibly worse. Hence, the argument goes that the United States should not give the legitimacy of its support to such a bad group of revolutionaries. This is a terribly weak argument. The political leaders of all of the Contra forces were opponents of Somoza and have espoused Democratic values for years. Of all of the key military leaders of the Contras only one had any connection with Somoza, Enrique Bermudez, and he was far removed from Somoza for a number of years as an envoy to the United States and has again, and again, repudiated the attrocities of the Somozan regime. Besides are we to say that we would never support a revolutionary government where some of its leaders were once officers who supported a corrupt dictator? The recent example in the Philippines makes a mockery of this argument. As to the human rights violations committed by the Contras, there is no question that some occurred, and have been admitted, but they are no greater and probably not as great as those committed by the Communist government in power. The worst violators of human rights in the history of the world have been and are Communist governments. We have little or no influence over human rights violations under Communist regimes which have consolidated power. They become closed societies.

If the freedom fighters were to come to power there is no reason to believe we would have any less success in curbing human rights violations than we have had in the case of El Salvador and, hopefully, will have in the Philippines.

Some opponents of the President's aid request argue that if things are so bad in Nicaragua and the national security interest of the United States is as great as the President says, then we should send in American forces. Frankly, the very point of supporting the Contras is to avoid ever having to use American troops in Central America. There are 20,000 Nicaragua freedom fighters ready to give their lives for freedom in their home country. It doesn't make any sense to needlessly sacrifice the lives of American soldiers when we can support these freedom fighters to accomplish our common goal objectives. However, make no mistake about it, if we fail to stop the Nicaraguan Communists through the support of the freedom fighters, they will consolidate their Communist regime and step-up their support of Communist guerrillas throughout Central America and somewhere along the line we will see the bloodshed of American soldiers south of our border.

Key Nicaraguan Communist leaders have been trained by the PLO. Terrorist training has been ongoing inside Nicaragua for years under the management, not only of Castro, but also under the watchful eye of PLO and Libyan operatives and representatives of such diverse terrorist groups as Italy's Red Brigade and Germany's Braader Meinhopf. Knowing this and knowing of the clearly spelled out intent of the Communist leaders of Nicaragua to spread their revolution elsewhere, can any one doubt the serious terrorist threat they will pose, not only to their neighboring Central American countries, but to the United States itself? The Salvadoran guerrillas recently revealed the type of product that the Nicaraguan Communist are producing when they issued their now famous broadcast on Radio Venceremos from Nicaragua on the occasion of our shuttle tragedy. Who can forget that they said:

> Given that two war criminals have died aboard the Challenger, we share the happiness felt by those (who) reject and condemn the U.S. imperialism's warmongering policy.

And if this is not enough to convince you to support the Contras, let me remind my colleagues that if we fail in this endeavor, before we see the terrorists at our borders, we're going to see millions and millions of refugees pouring into the United States. The fragile economies of Nicaragua's neighbors cannot sustain the kind of disruption that inspired Communist guerrilla activity will produce.

As I said at the beginning, the issues involved in this request for aid to the Contras is quite simple. We all know that the Nicaraguan Communist Government is bad and that if left unchecked it will spread its revolution and its terrorism to its neighbors and ultimately to the United States. The only question is how we go about stopping this before much more damage is done and the loss of the lives of American troops is required. Policies of continued negotiation only play into the hands of the Communists in Nicaragua and the policy of containment simply cannot work in this case. The only reasonable alternative to try is the aid to the Contras which the President is requesting. I strongly urge you to vote "yes" on aid to the Contras.

Any effort on our part to contain is going to be futile; there are land borders that we are involved with in this case; there is no way we can seal those borders. The results of either course of action, an attempt to pursue containment which is unrealistic, an attempt to pursue negotiations which the Sandinista Communists do not want, is a waste of our time. It gives them the opportunity to consolidate and carry their revolution next door; it gives them the opportunity to bring about a situation where we have no freedom fighters there.

Right now there are 20,000 freedom fighters from Nicaragua in Honduras and in the hills of Nicaragua willing to give their lives for freedom. Willing to die, willing to bring about democracy in that country; and yet we have some of my colleagues suggesting that instead of doing that, we ought to wait around for never-never land, until one day if things are bad enough, we will then send the Marines in and let American lives be lost in this battle.

I submit to you, my colleagues, the choice is very simple—and I do not question the patriotic motives or intent of any of my colleagues.

The choice is simple, though: The vote is, are you for the President's policy for democracy in Central America and vote "aye," or are you for the Communist Sandinistas in Nicaragua. And that is what a "no" vote is, for communism in Central America. It is as simple as that.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, 9 months ago this administration asked me to trust them with $27 million in humanitarian aid, and I did. Now they want $100 million. I made a mistake in trusting them, in casting that vote.

There are four reasons why we should reject this package; three stemming from that letter and one that is newly evolved. The administration said, in a famous letter, and there is talk of a lot of letters running around, that we supported the Contadora process.

We have undercut the Contadora process. We told the Contadora foreign ministers to take a hike; that we did not care about what they said on delaying the Contra vote.

How is that money going to be spent, we said. $27 million, very strict guidelines. We sent the GAO to investigate; the U.S. taxpayer has to know. We need to know. The administration said: "We can't provide you that information. It isn't there."

The third point: Contra reforms. Yes, there have been some reforms there, and yes, there are some Contras that I think have strong democratic credentials, but there is still an excessive Somocista influence. There is still a great amount of division. There is no political plan.

There is a new reason that has evolved; and that is called national priorities. I respect the talk about freedom fighters around the world, but I submit to everybody in this body that there are freedom fighters in this country, and the freedom fighters in this country are fighting farm foreclosures, they are fighting ignorance; and I say to this body that this $100 million can be better spent at a time of these deficits.

There is a lot of talk about compromises. There is a lot of talk about letters and Executive orders. I want my colleagues to know that BILL RICHARDSON made a mistake in accepting a letter before. I made a mistake in accepting something that was not in legislative language.

If there is going to be a compromise—and I understand the Speaker is allowing a vote 10 days after the recess, that we be able to see it in legislative language; that if we are going to reform the Contras, if we are going to include the entire Contra operation, Commander Zero, Eden Pastora, was left out for months, is the one individual that has a political base in Nicaragua; but the CIA could not contain him. There is division there.

Mr. McEWEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McEWEN. Let me just quickly point out in reference to the statement that we do not know where the money went or what happened to the $27 million: I respectfully submit that the GAO does not know where it is; however, the Intelligence Committees are fully aware, and as a Member of Congress, we would be more than happy to supply that to you this very moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thank my colleague.

My message to this body is, beware of letters, beware of compromises, unless they are in legislative language. Let us turn this package down so that if there is going to be a bipartisan constructive policy, it can be put in legislative writing, not in letters that come to you that do not mean anything, where they do not deliver; let us have the Congress impose those conditions.

I ask my colleagues to vote down this request today.

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MOLINARI].

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Chairman, colleagues, I was one of those that went to Nicaragua this past weekend, and I agree with the Members that got up here before and said, "Those of us that are engaging in this debate are probably not going to turn any votes."

I am not here to attempt to turn any votes. I am speaking, my colleagues, because I made a pledge to the marvelously brave people that I met in Nicaragua that I would come back to Congress and do my best to try to convey a message.

I would like to address just two issues. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. MONSON] talked about censorship that occurs in Nicaragua today. Take a look with me, if you will, the front page of La Prensa, the few days' articles before we got there. The red lines are those that were cut off by the Sandinista government.

Nothing left to this newspaper. Here we have 20-some-odd pages of articles that were censored in just 3 days of a newspaper that is only six pages long.

We have heard reference to Somoza. Under Somoza, the Catholic Church had channels 2 and 6 available to them, and when Somoza was guilty of atrocities, they were able to go before those two TV channels and talk about those atrocities. They had a radio station; they had a pastoral letter; they had bulletins. They do not have any of that anymore.

Eighty-five percent of that nation is Catholic. The Catholic Church has lost the ability to communicate. As a matter of fact, to say mass, to say mass in Nicaragua, the priests have to tape their mass 2 days in advance, and submit it to the government so they can censor—and they do censor.

□ 1420

And believe it or not, they even censor references to the Bible. That is what we are up against. And if I could, it troubles me as a Catholic to understand why there has been so much opposition from within the Catholic Church to the aid package that we are talking about today. This morning I had breakfast with Cardinal O'Connor, a man whom I think, commands great respect in this Nation of ours. I would like to read to you a letter authored by Cardinal O'Connor and by Cardinal Law from Boston. This was addressed to Cardinal Obando y Bravo:

YOUR EMINENCE: The present trials through which you and the Church in Nicaragua are suffering are a poignant reminder that the mystery of the Cross continues to be lived in the Body of Christ. During this Lent, your two brother bishops in the United States, who were called to membership in the College of Cardinals with you last May, have often thought of you and discussed the courageous efforts you make for the well-being of the Church and the people of Nicaragua. We have taken the extraordinary step of making this letter public so that the faithful in our archdioceses and as many as possible in our country will know what is actually happening to their brothers and sisters in Nicaragua.

We share your deep pain when your people are denied full opportunity to build a just, peaceful and progressive society based on the transcendent dignity of each human person. We know your suffering when attempts are made to violate the religious conscience of Nicaraguans by denying them access to the liberating teachings of the Church. This has been done by physical harassment, crude attempts at intimidation, and censorship. Priests have been summarily expelled from your country. Offices of your archdiocese have been raided by military personnel and remain under military occupation. The archdiocesan newspaper, Iglesia, was confiscated after its first edition, and the Catholic radio remains closed. You are subjected to a barrage of distortions, slanderous insults and innuendo at home and by some representatives of the government abroad.

In this ordeal, the Church in Nicaragua has been seeking to maintain the constructive dialogue with the government in an attempt to reach a climate of mutual respect so that the Church can play a role in the reconstruction of your country. We want to assure you of our solidarity with you. With you we are praying for that peaceful reconciliation necessary to rekindle the original hope of the revolution. For this to take place, it is essential that there be an immediate cessation of the present unjust restrictions suffered by the Church and other sectors of Nicaraguan society. This will undoubtedly provide a powerful impetus for the just resolution of the conflicts in your country and in that strife torn region.

Be assured of our prayers and support, our brother Cardinal, through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the "Most Pure," as the Nicaraguan people particularly venerate her.

Fraternally yours in Christ,

BERNARD CARDINAL LAW,
Archbishop of Boston.
JOHN CARDINAL O'CONNOR,
Archbishop of New York.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOLINARI. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, Saturday morning the gentleman told me that he had not been able to sleep 1 solitary minute in that now rundown Intercontinental Hotel. Why?

Mr. MOLINARI. If I could get 1 additional minute, I can tell you.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Try to do it in 30 seconds or he will think it is a conspiracy.

The gentleman did not know that I was going to ask him, did he?

Mr. MOLINARI. No, I did not.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I just want the gentleman to express to me what he did that morning.

Mr. MOLINARI. Well, when I went to La Prensa and I saw these articles I asked them could I please have copies of those to take back with me to Congress.

Mr. DORNAN of California. The censored articles that were censored that very morning.

Mr. MOLINARI. The censored articles; yes, sir. And they gave me these articles to bring back.

We had luncheon, we went to the Ambassador's residence for lunch, and I took them. I left them in the bus. I thought I left them in the bus. I went in and came back out and looked for them and could not find them.

That night I sat, having supper with one of the gentlemen, whose name I will leave out, from La Prensa, and I said I had lost the articles. I related what happened and I asked could I get duplicates and the man said in horror, "You lost the articles where?" I said, "On the bus."

He said, "But the bus is owned by the government, the driver works for the government."

Then horror struck me and I realized that I may have jeopardized somebody's life. I could not sleep. I stayed up all night thinking, "My God, how could I have done this?"

Mr. DORNAN of California. Because the gentleman had just heard stories of 11,000 political prisoners, most of them in solitary confinement where Somoza's evil bars had been replaced by sheets of metal, darkness, a tiny slot for the few meals, and the gentleman thought he had created this problem for the La Prensa heroes, the free press.

Mr. MOLINARI. I had heard stories that I will never forget for the rest of my life. It may not help in this debate.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his courtesy in extending me this time.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], a distinguished member of the committee.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in protest of the hijacking of a revolution by the Communists in Nicaragua.

Just as we have seen recently in the Philippines and Haiti, when the legitimate aspirations of a people are thwarted, an insurgency will result.

Denied a mechanism within the political framework for an expression of their will, the people will force that will through rebellion.

An insurgency, a revolution, is not a bad thing in and of itself.

It is normally an expression of intolerable, legitimate frustration.

Thus it was in Nicaragua under the Somoza regime.

The people had no way to change the regime, except by force of arms.

And they did.

The Sandinista rebellion was a legitimate, predictable, and successful answer to the frustration of democracy in Nicaragua.

But that revolution, unlike the Philippines, and we hope Haiti, was never allowed to proceed to its democratic conclusion.

It was hijacked by highly organized, efficient Marxist cell amongst the Sandinista leadership who have succeeded in driving all other hands off of the levers of power in Nicaragua.

The church, the free press, all political organizations, and the free enterprise sector of Nicaragua have all been stifled and pushed out of the revolution.

At issue today in Nicaragua is not whether the United States is going to fund a Contra movement, unfairly painted as counterrevolutionary.

Rather, the issue is whether we are going to allow the revolution to fulfill its promise for all Nicaraguans.

And that promise is free, open, pluralistic, and democratic government of all the people of Nicaragua.

We must not permit the consolidation of power by a tiny Communist minority into the endless darkness of a police state.

The issue here is the hijacking of a revolution.

It is a revolution which was long overdue, and remains overdue until this day, with the Marxists having diverted its course.

The commandantes have demonstrated unwillingness to share power with any component of Nicaraguan society, except their Communist colleagues.

They will deal with no other countries, save the Soviet bloc and Cuba.

The Nicaraguan people are not enemies of the people of the United States.

The ideals and goals of the Sandinista revolution closely parallel those of our own War for Independence.

Neither the people nor their goals are the targets of military aid to Nicaraguan freedom fighters.

The targets are, instead, the Marxist hijackers of the Sandinista revolution—that small cell which has perverted the legitimate aspirations of the Nicaraguan people.

Pressure must be unrelenting and focused on the commandantes in order to force them to allow the Nicaraguan people a voice in their own future.

We have seen the results of a lack of pressure.

We have seen it in elections which made mockery of the democratic process, and which kept in place the police state on the Soviet and Cuban model.

The leaders of Nicaragua exhibit a total disinterest in international negotiations and have demonstrated a clear intent of exporting their Marxist doctrine.

Our interest is not just limited to our belief in the freedom of mankind.

We have other interests as well.

If there is one commodity Communist states produce, and produce in abundance, it is refugees.

Already, the immigration and social service facilities along our southern border are stretched beyond their capacity to perform effectively.

Today's wave of immigrants seeking economic betterment will pale to insignificance before the tidal wave of immigration generated by the oppressiveness of Communist governments.

Do not say it will not happen—it has happened, time and again, as one country after another has been captured by the Communists.

In Eastern Europe, after the Second World War, in Southeast Asia after the fall of Vietnam, armies of refugees have fled, rather than surrender to a more repressive regime than they had ever known.

Are we prepared—economically, socially, and even emotionally—to cope with this problem which will be of our own making, if we stand by and watch the collapse of one Central American government after another?

For these reasons I urge that we authorize the military aid request.

We must wrest control from the hijackers of the Nicaraguan revolution and return it to its rightful owners—the Nicaraguan people.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS].

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, Managua, Nicaragua, is a beautiful town; that is the lilting lyric of a song of the 1940's. Yes, it is a beautiful town—for Cuban military advisers in the thousands who are gathered in that beautiful town as we speak here today.

Managua, Nicaragua is a wonderful place, the song goes on to say—a wonderful place for Soviet mechanics who are building an airstrip in Managua, Nicaragua.

Managua, Nicaragua, is a magnificent spot, the song goes on to say—it is a magnificent spot for terrorists to visit and Qadhafi and inspired individuals to make a stop on their way to world upheaval.

Managua, Nicaragua, is a beautiful spot but for the wrong reasons. Managua, Nicaragua, today has everything except freedom.

Members of the House, aid to the Contras constitutes an insurance policy for the people of the United States of America. It constitutes an insurance policy against such a day that we all want to avoid when American military troops must go into Nicaragua. It is an insurance policy against the massive flow of illegal aliens to our borders because of the Nicaraguan influence in Central America. It is an insurance policy in the final and best sense against those things that would harm the national security of our beloved Nation.

Let us support the President of the United States as he seeks to protect the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 3 minutes.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, we have all listened to the debate, and I am sure that both the people as well as the Members will have a difficult time deciding who are the good guys and who are the bad guys, depending on what information you rely upon.

But for the moment I would like the Chamber to focus on the simple issue of accountability, an issue that we should understand and that the public should understand. Where is this money going and are we indeed getting our money's worth? For the moment let us push aside the arguments whether we are for or against communism or who is committing the atrocities or whether indeed our policy is to overthrow the government.

Let us just focus for the moment on that very basic question: Do we know where the money is going? Is it following the requirements of the law? Are we getting our money's worth? That is the same test we apply on money if it goes to Medicare, or to student loans, or to legal aid, or if its goes to the Defense Department on weapons or toilet seats or tanks.

It is a very basic test.

Let us ask that question here. Last year we approved $27 million for humanitarian aid with a very specific requirement that the President establish procedures to ensure that it was being used for that purpose. The GAO, in testimony before the Committee on Foreign Relations, stated that not only had the President not set up those procedures, but that they did not know where 60 percent of the money was going.

Now we are not talking about covert money here, we are talking about overt money and we are talking about specific procedures that were built into the law.

□ 1435

We were talking about specific procedures that should have been set up by the State Department for that purpose.

Of the $12.5 million that has been spent, $7.1 million cannot be accounted for. It was put into a Miami bank, and at this point there is no audit trail with regard to those funds.

Yes, I hear the response, "Talk to the CIA." This is overt money. We should not have to go to the CIA. We ought to know where that money is going. The Department of State ought to be able to provide that information. This is not covert funding.

I have put in a resolution of inquiry. The Foreign Affairs Committee has asked for answers to these questions and, to this point, we have not received those answers.

The second question is: Are we getting our money's worth? Of the $100 million being spent here, have we achieved the goal of interdicting arms? It has failed. Have we achieved the goal of overthrowing the Government? It has failed. Have we achieved the goal of establishing any kind of provisional government or capturing areas in Nicaragua? It has failed.

Now we are asked to provide another $100 million.

If we were to apply the same test to any other program, we would have terminated these funds a long time ago. There is no accounting. It violates the provisions of law that were established for this aid. And last, it is not accomplishing its goal.

The President is asking for a blank check; the Congress ought not to sign it.

The following is the full text of the statement I have summarized above:

Mr. Chairman, I would like to shift the focus of this debate on aid to the Contras for just a few minutes. Becasue it seems to me that we could stand her from now until the end of time making value judgments about each other's arguments and motives. That kind of debate is not going to solve anything because we are talking about shades of gray here, not about black and white. Instead, I would like to discuss this issue from another angle; dollars and cents.

I do not believe Congress should approve this aidpackage for two reasons. First of all, we cannot afford it. And secondly, because the dollars we already have appropriated for this program are being handled in a fiscally irresponsible and unaccountable manner. To provide more money for this program would be like throwing more money into a big, bottomless pit.

I do not need to remind any of my colleagues that we face an unprecedented Federal deficit. Recently, the Congress has had to confront some tough choices about how to deal with this growing deficit. We decided it was necessary to cut the budget—fairly and equitably—in order to meet deficit reduction targets.

Now, the President is asking for $100 million for aid to the Contras. You could make an excellent case that we should not be considering spending an extra $100 million on anything, let alone for something as controversial as an aid package for the Contras.

Gramm-Rudman requires sacrifices from nearly every citizen in this country. I do not know how we can take federal dollars away from the American people with one hand and turn around and give to the Contras with another. If we do not have $100 million to provide COLAs for our military retireees or to provide money for our kids to go to college, then we do not have $100 million to give to the Contras.

We have already spent tens of millions of dollars providing aid to the Contras and it has not gotten us one step closer to achieving peace in Central America. We have done everything we can for the Contras short of sending in the Marines. And they still have not succeeded. Not only that, but we can not even be sure that the money we have already invested is being spent in accordance with Congressional intent. And that leads me to my second point: the money Congress has already appropriated for this program is being handled in a fiscally irresponsible and unaccountable manner by the Administration.

Last year, Congress agreed to provide $27 million to the Contras. Congress was very explicit about how this aid should be used. It was only to be used for so-caled "humanitarian" purposes. One of the provisions of this legislation required that the President establish, and I quote, "appropriate procedures to ensure that any humanitarian assistance provided by the United States Government to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance is used only for the intended purpose." In other words, the President was required to set up procedures to make sure that our aid was not traded, bartered, or exchanged for any non-humanitarian materials or equipment.

But, recently the GAO testified that the President has not set up the procedures required by law. And because these procedures have not been set up, we can not really be sure where the bulk of the money has gone. Almost 60 percent of the money that has so far been spent to provide aid to the Contras has been spent outside the United States. These payments have been channeled through a Miami bank and brokers selected by the Contra suppliers. And yet, the GAO says that there is no audit trail showing what this money has been used to procure or whether the goods bought with this money have even been received by the Contras. To make matters worse, we cannot be sure that some U.S. logistical aid is not being traded or exchanged for lethal equipment.

So this is where we stand. The President has violated the law with regard to handling this program. As a result, the GAO cannot tell us where $7.1 million we appropriated have gone.

And this situation is not going to get better by magic. The GAO says that more and more of the aid dollars will, by necessity, be channeled through the region itself. This new money, in other words, will follow the same channels that the missing $7.1 million followed. We are no longer talking about $7.1 million. Now, we are talking about $100 million.

And it could get even worse if the CIA contingency funds are used—an estimated $400 million. The Administration will claim that it cannot tell us how much has been spent and on what because it would "jeopardize an intelligence operation." Right now we are dealing with an overt program that is irresponsible and unaccountable. Later, we could be dealing with a completely clandestine operation. Congress will have no way to oversee the operation or even to know if it is being handled in a fiscally responsible manner.

Congress needs some answers to some very important questions before we consider giving any more money to the Contras. Questions like: Where is the $7.1 million? Are the Contra aid dollars being handled in line with Congressional intent? Is our "humanitarian" aid being traded for lethal equipment and supplies?

In order to get at some of these answers, I have introduced a Resolution of Inquiry—H. Res. 395—which directs the President to provide Congress with all the information his Administration possesses on these issues. Congress should not appropriate one dollar more for Contra aid until we get these answers.

This is a tough issue. It would certainly be nice if everything was as black and white as some would have us believe. But no one is going to give us a break and make the decision that easy.

Like it or not, we have to make a choice. And it is going to be a tough one. But it is going to get tougher. If Congress wants to continue to exercise any kind of oversight over the Contra aid program, now is the time to do it, before the CIA contingency funds wind up in a bank in Miami and Congress has no way of knowing how much is there or what it is being use for. Unless Congress wants to completely relinquish its share of the control over this operation, we had better act now.

Regardless of your position on the aid issue, after all is said and done, we should be concerned with only one thing: the best way to achieve peace and to prevent the deaths of innocent people in Nicaragua. We are not going to reach that goal by throwing money at the Contras. And we are not going to reach that goal by looking the other way while millions of American dollars are poured down the drain.

I know that this issue is not going to be decided solely on the basis of the questions I have raised. But Congress needs to look at this issue from all sides. These are the facts. The Congress is now subsidizing a program that is not meeting specified legal requirements. It does not even meet the basic standards of fiscal responsibility and accountability. We may never really know what happened to the $7.1 million. But we can keep from throwing good money after bad.

Mr. Chairman, President Reagan has written a blank check for the Contras. The question before the Congress is whether we are going to sign that blank check. I say "no."

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McEWEN].

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to the gentleman from California, who is an expert in the budget area in the Congress and a very good friend of mine, that the GAO report has been repudiated by the Department of State repeatedly, that while they may have been unable to successfully follow the audit trail, it is available to Members of Congress. The time is being handled by a member of the Intelligence Committee, who I am sure would be more than happy to make that information available to the gentleman this very day. The GAO has been repudiated by every knowledgeable source to my knowledge, and I would not want my friend and the expert in this area to rely upon the GAO report when it has been proven to be so inaccurate.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. If the gentleman from Ohio will yield, I would like to ask the gentleman in the well a question.

Is the gentleman familiar with the language in the 1986 foreign assistance bill with regard to overt aid to Afghanistan and Cambodia?

Mr. PANETTA. This gentleman is not familiar with that. This gentleman is only familiar with the money that was supposed to go for humanitarian aid.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. There is $15 million in humanitarian aid given to Afghanistan, and also $5 million for humanitarian or military aid to Cambodia.

The language is the same. The conferees recognized that the nature of the assistance to be provided requires some degree of flexibility in the application of standard audit procedures and requirements.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, somebody ought to tell the General Accounting Office. They are the ones that report to the Congress on this issue.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, opponents of the President's request for aid to the democratic resistance argue that no military assistance should be given so that there can be more time to give negotiations a chance. Efforts to negotiate with the Communist Sandinista regime in Nicaragua have been made since August 1981, with no perceptible movement toward agreement in all that time.

In 1981, there was no Contra movement opposing the Sandinistas; there was only internal unarmed opposition. Yet, there was no reconciliation with the opposition. From June 1984 to September 1985, there was no official U.S. Government assistance going to the Contras; but, the Sandinistas only increased their repression of their people and strengthened their military with more arms from the Soviets, including the deadly Hind MI-24 helicopter gunships. Had the Sandinistas been sincere about negotiating they could have accepted a Contadora draft that would have served as a basis for a verifiable and enforceable agreement.

One of the guiding principles of Contadora is national reconciliation. It was explicitly accepted by all five Central American States, including Nicaragua, in the September 1983 document of objectives. Although they signed the document of objectives, the Sandinistas have consistently rejected dialog with the democratic resistance in Nicaragua. Furthermore, the Sandinistas rejected efforts by the unarmed opposition to participate fully in the November 1984 elections.

Even before the elections, the Nicaraguan bishops issued their pastoral letter Easter Sunday, April 22, 1984, calling for a dialog among "all Nicaraguans inside and outside the country * * * (including) Nicaraguans who have taken up arms against the government." Interesting to note that it was after this that the Pope elevated Obando y Bray to cardinal. The Sandinistas flatly rejected the bishops' call, and the Los Angeles Times, in its April 26, 1984, editorial wrote:

> The Sandinistas acted every bit as irrational and oppressive as their opponents claim they are * * *. The hysterical Sandinista response is not encouraging to those who seek a peaceful way out of Central America's political crisis.

In July 1979, the Sandinistas formally pledged to the OAS to establish a democratic, pluralistic, nonaligned regime with a mixed economy. But only in late 1983, did the Sandinistas finally announce elections for late 1984. The Sandinistas, however, did everything possible to set the terms of the elections so they would be favorable to themselves. The Sandinistas:

Lowered the voting age to 16 to permit the youth already indoctrinated and controlled by Sandinista youth organizations to vote;

Restricted access to media by limiting the amount of time opposition candidates could have on government-controlled radio and television;

Rejected international observers;

Banned certain Nicaraguans from participating in the elections;

Permitted opposition candidates to campaign only from August 8 to October 31; and Prohibited discussion of national security issues during the campaign—national security issues were deemed to include economic issues.

One of the nine Sandinista Commandantes, Bayardo Arce, called the elections "bothersome" and "out of place." He admitted the elections would not have taken place had it not been for the pressure of the U.S.-backed war by the Contras.

The unarmed opposition in Nicaragua called the democratic coordinator backed Arturo Cruz for the presidency and established nine conditions as necessary for free elections in Nicaragua. The Sandinistas rejected those conditions, and Cruz ultimately refused to participate since the elections would be neither free nor fair.

The rejection by the Sandinistas of the democratic coordinator's efforts to participate in the elections should be a telling example of the lack of sincerity of the Sandinistas for accommodating the opposition to their regime. The democratic coordinator was an unarmed opposition group. And I stress the word "unarmed". If there were any reason to believe the Sandinistas want to have a peaceful dialog with their opposition, then they should have accomplished that with the democratic coordinator.

The democratic coordinator, however, persevered, on February 22, 1985, the coordinator issued a statement calling on the Nicaraguan bishops to mediate a dialog, providing for the representation of all Nicaraguans and urged that the dialog sponsored by the church be "attended by guarantors whose presence would endorse the commitments made to the Nicaraguan people."

On March 1, 1985, in San Jose, Costa Rica, the democratic resistance—the armed opposition—also issued a statement offering a cease-fire in return for an agreement by the Nicaraguan regime to begin a dialog mediated by the Nicaraguan bishops. The Washington Post, in its March 17, 1985, editorial said:

> The proposal offers more than a chance for national reconciliation. It lets Nicaraguans remove their fate from foreign hands and restore it to Nicaraguan hands alone.

On March 22, 1985, the Nicaraguan bishops issued a communique accepting a mediation role in the dialog. On April 4, 1985, President Reagan asked the democratic resistance to extend their offer of a cease-fire from April 20 to June 1 and urged the Sandinistas to accept also. The President asked that his request for military assistance be approved, but that it would not be used for arms or munitions as long as negotiations were proceeding. Congress refused to approve his request for military aid last year, Daniel Ortega flew off to Moscow, and the Sandinistas rejected negotiations for internal reconciliation.

Why should we make the same mistake again?

The only times in the past the Sandinistas have accommodated their opposition has been when they have been pressured to do so. The strength of the democratic resistance in Nicaragua remains the one reason the Sandinistas need to negotiate.

We must not weaken the democratic resistance and remove the incentive for the Sandinistas to negotiate.

We must support the President's request for aid to the Contras.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman serves, and has for 4 years now, on the subcommittee that is most related to this area of study, the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I might say that I had served on that subcommittee since I came to Congress. I have been the ranking Republican on the subcommittee.

Mr. DORNAN of California. The ranking Republican, for two terms now, and over a decade on that committee, tracking the emergence of democracies from Cape Horn all the way up to Guatemala. We have seen some dark days.

How many times has the gentleman visited Central America now?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. About five.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Well, I think this puts the gentleman in a position to analyze the situation where heads of state and foreign ministers and other distinguished of our brothers and sisters down there in Central and South America will say different things to us in public.

Now, somebody said to me, in a phone interview, was I accusing them of lying. And I pointed out, "Not any more than I accused the Thai Government of lying when they denied there were American air bases in Thailand."

There are countries that feel that there is so much indecision in our foreign policy over the last two decades, that we are going to pull out and leave them twisting in the wind, facing 155 Russian tanks.

Could the gentleman relate to us, in the honorable way he always has, without betraying confidences, what they tell you in private, as one of the Members of this House with longest track record of meeting with these distinguished legislators and government officials from Central and South America?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. When I was in Nicaragua about 1 year ago with Congressman DEWINE, I had experiences much like the ones you and your colleagues had when you went to Nicaragua last weekend. Everyone we spoke to, the press, the labor unions, the human rights organizations, the free-enterprise people, small businessmen who were not represented in the major organizations of free enterprise, almost everyone we spoke to agreed on two things: No. 1, that the Sandinistas were repressive and were exporting a revolution and, second, that if something happened to the Contras, that the revolution would be turned full force against them, they would be wiped out.

Some of them went so far as to say we should support the Contras. Most did not but they would say, however, "If the Contras go away, we will be in serious trouble."

In talking with leaders of some of those countries down there, they said much of the same thing, but they always did say, this is true, "But we cannot say this publicly. Please do not quote us publicly."

I have a telegram, a classified telegram, at the desk, that anyone can look at who wants to, that quotes a high government official from one of those countries as saying about the same thing privately. He would not say it publicly.

Mr. DORNAN of California. The gentleman has that secret communique at the desk on this side?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Yes; I do.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I hope some of our colleagues on the other side will take advantage of reading it.

Have you heard anything like this: One of them said to me, in a very sincere but good-natured way, "Isn't the United States big enough and strong enough to take the heat of our giving you public advice that we really don't believe?" In other words, they said, "We are so fragile and so in danger if you decide to retreat to the fortress America"—was the expression one high diplomat used—"we are really in danger here. Can't you take the heat politically for both of us?"

And I did not know what to say to him because there is a frustration that in key debates like this that might turn on a few votes, we could, frankly, win over many, many Members on both sides of the aisle of good will if we could have their frank statements to present, particularly when they are being quoted against us in their public positions.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. The gentleman mentioned Thailand. I do not imagine if you went to Thailand today and publicly asked the Government there whether they were assisting the rebels who are going into Cambodia against the Vietnamese there, that they would say, "Yes, we are." If you went to Pakistan, I know they will not admit that they are assisting in any way. Yet logic compels the belief that if the Mujahedeen are receiving any kind of outside support at all, it must go through Pakistan.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Well, people will try to disprove the Indo-China domino theory by saying Thailand held firm.

I just had a meeting with their foreign minister, with eight members who went over to Hanoi on the MIA issue. We had a good long private meeting with their foreign minister. And I am not going to hold him up to any contradictory statements, but I told him that he was the stainless-steel domino welded to the table that did not fall even though we pulled out on them. And he said he liked that analogy. I said, "Call one of your fighter squadrons the stainless-steel dominoes, then."

These is no stainless steel domino in Central America. We discussed that. Honduras is not welded to any table of democracy. Their democracy is very fragile. There have been many human rights violations in Guatemala. Costa Rica has no military force at all. They would rather have a wonderful tradition. I wish we had it in this Chamber. Every 4 years the party in power gives up their jobs because of the people's decision. and the postmen and the electricians and the sheet metal workers go into government, and the government people, about 4,000 or 5,000 of them, do musical chairs and take over their jobs as the border patrol and the police. But they are left naked to the kind of Soviet-Cuban aggression. And I just wish people on the other side had your experience dealing with men and women of honor who have to say something different publicly because their own survival, not their political survival—that, too—the survival of their country as a democracy is a stake in case the arsenal democracy is slammed closed, our economic coffers are closed because of our own deficit problems, and these people are left by their own diplomatic craftiness and devices to try to deal with a Soviet coloy right smack in the middle of the Isthmus of Central America.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I might just add one thing. I first went to Nicaragua in November 1979, shortly after the revolution that overthrew Somoza, a broad-based revolution. I was the only Member of the delegation—I think there were eight of us—who came back with doubts about what the Sandinistas were going to do. Well, I should not say I was the only one with doubts; I was the only one who was convinced what they were going to do.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Was that before or after July 19?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. It was after July 19, after they had taken over.

I came back with the feeling that this was already a Marxist-Leninist regime and that they were well on their way and that we should not support them. The majority of the people with me either did not agree with that or they felt that it was worth the chance. Some of you might recall that we had a vote on that request for $75 million in aid. It passed by 3 votes. So they got the assistance, and we did provide a lot of assistance, until it was cut off by President Carter, before President Reagan was even inaugurated.

I had a meeting in my office several weeks ago with Arturo Cruz and Alfonso Robelo. Arturo Cruz turned to me—I forget if the gentleman was there or not—and he said, "You were the only one who was right. We were wrong about the Sandinistas."

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE].

Mr. LEVINE of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, as we consider whether or not to approve the Reagan administration's request for $100 million to arm the Contra insurgency in Nicaragua, I believe it is important to understand what we are really debating today and what we are not debating.

The issue on the table before this House is not whether or not the Sandinistas are good guys. They are not. I know of no Member of this body who supports the policies of the Sandinistas. The issue is not who has a better human rights record, the Contras or the Sandinistas. They have both demonstrated their disregard for human rights.

The issue is not how disreputable a collection of friends the Sandinistas have collected, nor is it U.S. policy in the Middle East, as some are now suggesting.

The issue is not who among us are better or more patriotic Americans.

I think and I would hope that it would be time for us all to stipulate that each Member of this body is an honorable and a patriotic American.

Instead, what we are debating is whether or not the Congress should give this administration's failed policies in Nicaragua its stamp of approval.

What we are debating is what policy better serves the national security interests of the United States. What we are debating is how best to remove the Soviet and Cuban presence in Central America and how to discourage Nicaraguan adventurism beyond its own borders.

And what we are debating is whether to support or reject a policy which eventually will lead to American troops in Nicaragua when diplomacy instead would have served us better.

Members of the administration, Mr. Chairman, have already admitted that the time will come when American military personnel will have to be sent into the region to train the Contras. It will only be a matter of time, if we approve this request today, until those advisers accompany their students into combat.

So let everyone here understand that if we pass this request we are committing ourselves to fighting a long, bloody, expensive war in Central America, a war with little or no public support in this country and a war with little or no support in Central America itself.

Are we going to cut our losses now and try a new policy? Or will we continue down a path which will cost the taxpayers of this country billions of dollars and eventually result in the deaths of American soldiers fighting in Central America?

For the last 6 months I have served as chairman of the Democratic Caucus Task Force on Central America. That task force is composed of Democrats from across the political spectrum. It contains Members who supported the President the last time he asked for logistical aid to the Contras.

Yet every Member of that broadly representative task force agrees that the request we are now being asked to approve is ill-conceived and inconsistent with our national interests.

Our report contains, instead, a positive policy. We urge a renewed emphasis on negotiation and diplomacy. We urge more than a symbolic commitment to Contadora, and we have recommended a program to accomplish a diplomatic policy and program in the region. We urge a new emphasis on economic aid to combat the plagues of hunger and deprivation. It recognizes that our current policies have little or no support among our allies in the region, and our report recognizes that, despite the excuses of the administration, that leaders in the region say one thing in public and another thing in private, the fact remains that the democracies in the region do not support our current policies.

Indeed the danger of speaking out by one of the democratically elected leaders in the region of Central America in opposition to Reagan administration policies was demonstrated recently when the President of Costa Rica had the courage to urge that the $100 million we are discussing here today be spent on economic instead of on military aid.

The administration's response to that democratically elected leader of Costa Rica was, instead of even listening to him, to withhold $2 million in aid to Costa Rica earmarked for road construction.

Once again this administration has demonstrated its intolerance for views inconsistent with its foreign policy.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVINE of California. I will say to the gentleman that if I have time, I will yield to him, despite the fact that he did not yield to me. Let me see whether I will have time at the end of my statement.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I appreciate that.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Chairman, the time has come to put an end to the war in Nicaragua. Rather than squander $100 million on a cause destined to fail, we should act now to implement a policy which is in our national interest. No matter how well intentioned, and I do not doubt that those who support the administration are well intentioned, the policy of the administration cannot succeed.

I urge my colleagues to defeat the administration's request and instead use the $100 million to rebuild and strengthen the democratic institutions and economies of our allies in Central America.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MINETA].

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong opposition to the President's request for aid to the Contras. For 6 years I served on the Select Committee on Intelligence and watched with alarm the unfolding of the administration's warlike script in Nicaragua. It began with some covert aid and a few advisers. Now we are discussing whether to send $100 million in military assistance to the Contras. I fear what the next step may be.

What have the Contras achieved after 5 years of support from this administration? Well, after 5 years, some 70 percent of their forces are not even in Nicaragua, but in base camps in Honduras. The Contras have been likened to our Founding Fathers, yet they have been accused of shocking human rights violations. These so-called freedom fighters have been embraced by our President, but they do not have the popular support of their own people.

So what will $100 million for the Contras accomplish this year? Will it make the Sandinistas buckle to the demands of power sharing with the Contras? Obviously not. Will it make the Sandinistas reform themselves into being democratic? That is ludicrous. In fact, the Sandinistas will continue to use the Contra war only as an excuse to consolidate their power.

What the $100 million will do is continue the flow of United States aid to the Contras. If the President is successful in securing this aid, I predict we will be debating votes for greater and greater assistance, military advisers, and, finally, perhaps, U.S. troop support.

Mr. Chairman, this is so clearly not the direction the American people want to take.

On Sunday the President asked the American people to call their Representatives. And indeed they called. Some 400 people in my district called and 75 percent urged me to vote against aid to the Contras.

Mr. Chairman, the question today is not whether we are for the Contras or for the Sandinistas, as the administration has wrongly framed the argument. It is rather whether we are for the Contadora peace process.

When our Latin allies plead with us not to support the Contras, and when they ask us to join with them in finding a regional solution through the Contadora peace process, we should not turn a deaf ear. If we support the Contadora process, we must reject this Contra aid request.

Mr. Chairman, let us not spend another dime on this misbegotten foreign policy.

□ 1500

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

My colleagues on both sides of the aisle, you who cannot find it in their wisdom to support the President, please do not take exception to my quoting President John F. Kennedy. You quote President Eisenhower often on the military-industrial complex, and I understand that. We quote the great Senator Henry Jackson a great deal. Please respect that, because if we quote John Foster Dulles to you or President Eisenhower on foreign policy, you always turn a deaf ear.

Some people believe President Kennedy's very best speech was that near the wall of pain and death that separates East Berliners from West Berliners. I think his inaugural speech on January 20, 1961 was his finest, but the June 1963 Berlin was, also, truly magnificent. You will recall that President Kennedy told a massive crowd of cheering and sometimes weeping Germans the following:

> Two thousand years ago the proudest boast was "Civis Romanus sum", I am a citizen of Rome. Today in the world of freedom the proudest boast is "Ich bin ein Berliner".

Now, here is the part of this speech that I think perfectly applies to this dangerous world today a quarter of a century later. When a Member of Congress visits a Communist country as I just have with my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER] you reflect deeply on the precious liberties of our wonderous republic. On the 14th of February, Mr. DREIER and I with six other Members visited Communist capital city of Hanoi, and then 1 month to the day on the 14th of March we flew into the Communist capital city of Managua. What a striking comparison between these downtrodden totalitarian cities and all, repeat all, of the neighboring democratic cities in their area of the world.

Here is what President Kennedy said about these stark comparisons.

> There are many people in the world who really don't understand, or say they don't, what is the great issue between the free world and the Communist world. Let them come to Berlin. There are some who say that Communism is the wave of the future. Let them come to Berlin. . . . And there are even a few who say that it is true that Communism is an evil system.

Pardon me for footnoting this eloquent President's speech, but was Kennedy criticized for calling communism "an evil system?" Of course, he was not.

> And there are even a few who say that it is true that Communism is an evil system, but it permits us to make economic progress. "Lasst sie nach Berlin kommen."

Let them come to Berlin. That was the speech that he ended with, "I am a Berliner," and the crowds of Berliners went wild. No one criticized that handsome Irish American President for saying he was in his heart a German, a Berliner, but when President Reagan said, "I am a Contra," he was hit with acrimonious derision from several quarters of our country.

The members who went to Hanoi discussed on our airplane after we left Bangkok or after we arrived in Seoul, Korea, the stark comparison between the free world and the Communist world. I recalled Kennedy's Berlin speech. And we agreed that if people do not understand the difference between the free world and the Communist world, today, let them go to Hanoi and then Hong Kong, Hanoi and then Singapore.

Let them see Taipei and then Hanoi, or Bangkok and then Hanoi. And the same applies in our hemisphere with Managua, Nicaragua.

I say if you want to see the difference in our hemisphere, on our continent, between freedom and communism, then visit Managua and then San Salvador. Visit with President Duarte as nine of us did Saturday and compare liberty in San Salvador with oppression in Managua.

I say to my colleagues of conscience on the other side, "vaya se Managua", "go to Managua". See the economic decay or dreary life or both that parallels Hanoi, Bucharest, Phnom Phen, Warsaw, Kabul, or Luanda. It is always an Orwellian bad dream that is unfortunately all too real.

The only major difference between Hanoi and Managua is that Americans, many of them from the religious left, are allowed to prowl around some few areas of Nicaragua mouthing platitudes about "it ain't so bad." No one is allowed to travel in Hanoi, Vietnam, except the one team allowed once in 13 years to look for the bones of American heroes. And they were carefully escorted. Useful fools, "Tontos utiles" is Spanish. That's what carefully watched Americans are who go on the Potemkin tours of Nicaragua.

An observation my colleagues. Here are the publications that are available to us this year that were not available last April and June for the freedom fighter aid debates. "The Soviet-Cuban Connection in Central America."

"Nicaragua: Will Democracy Prevail?"

"The 72-Hour Document."

A packet of excellent articles from around the world just as you liberals circulate leftist press articles. Here is what is available just in the last month.

"Alvaro Baldizon on the Interior Ministry of Terror of Tomás Borge." I said many times if this man Baldizon could be shown up as a double agent, I would switch my vote. Baldizon speaks about teams of Communist Sandinista soldiers sent to East Germany for over 6 months of training to come home to Nicaragua to impersonate Contras in perfect Contra uniforms and kill their own people just to make political points for the U.S. Congress and world opinion. I have not seen that happen so blatently since Adolf Hitler's SS guards dressed as Polish enlisted men and officers, slipped across the Polish border, turned around and came back attacking and killing their own Wermacht troops as a provocation to start World War II. Hitler fooled no one. Unfortunately, U.S. Congressmen are fooled by the same murderous evil deception by the Communists in Nicaragua.

Here's another booklet, "The Sandinista Military Buildup." This one I want people across America who are in doubt on this issue to write for. Write to me. I'll send it to you. Your tax dollars printed it. I am sorry that these last four were not in the offices of my colleagues last night. They can change votes. These booklets are being delivered today through the House mail system as we speak. "From Revolution to Repression." "Human Rights in Nicaragua Under the Sandinistas."

You still have time to digest them tonight if your vote is in doubt.

Here is one, "The Sandinistas and the Middle Eastern Radicals."

I did not staple this a Novak and Evans column, "Israel and the Contras" in spite of my friendship with those fine journalists, but it's a powerful article.

In the words of the Communist commandantes "In Their Own Words," is particularly noteworthy. It quotes the Communists to you over and over again, where they tell us what they are going to do, and then documents their thoughts and utterances on the Nicaraguan resistance, their leaders, their military personnel and their programs.

Read these and weep and then for our children's future vote with the President tomorrow.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN].

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

MAKING FOREIGN POLICY IS LIKE MAKING ANY OTHER IMPORTANT CHOICE IN LIFE

If you want to help your children select the right college, you talk to experts, people who know the scoop first hand. In this case, counselors, educator, college placement officers. You also go and see whether the expert's advice makes sense.

But when it comes to our Central American policy, the administration wants to make policy from a Washington arm chair. Patrick Buchanan and others want to call Members of Congress Communist dupes' without ever having talked to a Contra soldier or a Central American leader.

In my part of the country, when you want to get a solution to a problem, you talk to the people directly affected. If it's farm problem, you talk to other farmers. If it's city problem, you talk with local citizens. If it's a neighborhood problem, you talk it over with your neighbors.

But this administration wants to make policy for all of Central America without even heeding the views of the people who live there. More particularly, when it comes to sending more military aid to the Contra guerrillas in Nicaragua, the White House wants to ignore the virtually unanimous advice of all of our Latin American neighbors and partners.

WHAT DO OUR NEIGHBORS SAY ABOUT CONTRA AID?

First, eight Latin American foreign ministers made an unprecedented visit to Washington to last month and pleaded with the administration not to send more military aid to the Contras.

It seems to me that it makes sense to hear the counsel of Mexico, Colombia, Venezuela, Panama, Peru, Argentina, and Brazil. These are not dupes of Moscow; they are our Rio Treaty allies. These are not the enemies of America; they are friendly nations most directly affected by what we do. These are not voices of repression; they represent nations struggling to make democracy work.

Second, moreover, the Presidents of both Costa Rica and Colombia have publicly urged the United States to close down the Contra arms pipeline. These are not private messages of the fearful—they are are open declarations of leaders in the free world.

Yet the administration wants to smear the integrity of these leaders by saying that they whisper other messages in private. But no democratic leader worth his salt can endure if his public utterances clash with his private entreaties. As one South American envoy said, "It is unrealistic for the United States to say that all of our diplomatic work is for show. This attitude leads nowhere."

Third, the administration would also say that opinion polls in Central America show overwhelming support for Contra aid—especially in Costa Rica.

What the Contra-aid supporters don't say is that the most recent poll in Costa Rica shows only 39 percent approval for more guns. What the administration doesn't say is that the President-elect of Costa Rica flatly opposes more Contra aid. Guatemala's newly elected President, Vinicio Cereza has made the same plea.

Fourth, our Latin neighbors, which face the most immediate threat from any potential Sandinista military aggression or gun-running, have urged the United States to negotiate with Nicaragua via the Contadora peace process and genuine bilateral negotiations. They have ruled out a guerrila war as a practical solution to the region's problems. The original Contadora group—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama—have been trying for 3 years to draft a regional peace treaty for Central America. The Contadora group now enjoys the support of some 300 million in all Latin American nations except three.

What remains is for the President to make a full-fledged, genuine commitment to join our neighbors in working out a negotiated settlement to regional conflict. Until then, guerrilla war and atrocities by both sides in Nicaragua and El Salvador will leave a trail of war dead and civilian casualties—all without cause or reason.

WHY DO OUR NEIGHBORS PROPOSE ANOTHER COURSE?

First, our neighbors believe that Contra aid violates the principle of nonintervention, the bedrock of both the OAS and United Nations charters. If we would preach nonintervention to the Soviets and Cubans, isn't it time that we clean up our own backyard? Our friends to the south fear and resent gringo imperialism under the cloak of the Monroe Doctrine, aid to freedom fighters, or any other self-serving guise.

Second, our Latin allies also fear that Contra aid is the first step on the road to direct U.S. military involvement. As Peruvian President Alan Garcia said recently, "The Latins are saying very strongly that the time has come to tell the United States that you can't just send the marines into Latin America anymore." It's time we learned to use our power more resourcefully.

Third, our friends also worry about a wider spread of conflict unless all parties hammer out a peace treaty for Central America. One South American Ambassador noted that "The United States' (Contra) support efforts lead to concern that it could be the cause of destabilization of and greater conflict in Central America."

Fourth, many of our friends would also tell us that the Contras simply can't win. I have heard estimates that if the guerrillas in El Salvador had the same level of aid as the Contras, they long ago would have toppled the Duarte government. Even if they did win, would the price be worth paying? As former Contra chief Edgar Chamorro said, "Let us imagine * * * after protracted conflict—thousands more deaths and millions of dollars spent—suppose the Contras win. The Sandinistas would fight from the hills * * *. If the Contras win with direct United States intervention, then we are back to 1928. Back to the marines in Nicaragua and the creation of a new Somoza, a new National Guard and a new Sandino." For my money, this is a bad bet.

Fifth, our Democratic friends would also remind us that regardless of whether the Contras can win, we don't want to back that kind of winner. Amnesty International and several other human rights groups have all painted a grim picture of Contra behavior—one of torture, civilian murder, rape, and brutality. This is not to say that the Sandinistas are Boy Scouts—they have their own sorry record on human rights. But I strongly believe that our backing of the Contras only helps the Sandinistas to justify their own excesses.

Sixth, one new Central American leader, President-elect Oscar Arias Sanchez of Costa Rica, put his finger on perhaps the fundamental weakness of our Central American policy. He made clear that "If I were Mr. Reagan, I would give that money to Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica for economic aid, not military aid to the Contras." In a nutshell, send food for the hungry, books for the illiterate, and medicine for the sick.

A POLICY THAT WORKS

To summarize, when you want to solve a problem you talk with people with firsthand experience with the conflict. In this case, we ignore at our own peril the advice of our Latin American neighbors, friends, and allies.

It's time we bend our efforts toward an approach that makes sense, toward a policy which will succeed. Our present policy is a dismal failure—it has not brought us closer to either peace or victory. It's time to change course and enter into genuine bilateral talks with the Sandinistas, without self-destructive preconditions. More importantly, it's time to hear the voices of 300 million Latin American friends and press ahead with peace negotiations in the Contadora process.

If those good-faith efforts fail, let's examine whether any real threat from Nicaragua justifies covert aid or military intervention. But lets not draw our swords until we struggle for peace.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 seconds to respond to a statement by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE].

The gentleman talked about the cutting off of aid for a road project in Costa Rica. I want to inform the gentleman that the cutoff or the cutdown of the project was due to technical problems which preceded the statement by President Arias and had nothing to do with Arias' statement.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to just since we are quoting great men like President John F. Kennedy, I think it ought to be set straight for the record on what his attitude was toward communism in this hemisphere.

We all know what the Kennedy doctrine was. We know what he did as far as Mr. Khrushchev was concerned in turning back the ships and in putting an embargo on Cuba for a short time, but I doubt if any of my colleagues on the other side know what John F. Kennedy said the last day he was alive when he was in Houston, TX, before he flew to Dallas on that fateful day when he was assassinated.

He said, "The one thing we must not allow is for the Communists to get a toehold on the North American Continent."

They do not have a toehold there, my friends. They have 119,000 men in their active army and militia. They have T-55 tanks, they have Hind killer helicopters. They received 18,000 tons of war material from the Soviet Union just last year; so the things John F. Kennedy stood for, freedom and democracy, are being subverted in Central America, and my colleagues on the other side of the aisle when they think about that great leader of their party ought to remember that. He would not tolerate communism getting a toehold in Central America during his administration and we should not allow it to flourish there now.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COURTER].

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was wondering what my contribution to this debate was and would be and it is an interesting debate, there is no doubt about that.

I thought I would just talk a couple minutes about an event that occurred on December 7, 1985, and I think another person alluded to it.

There was an automobile, it was a Soviet automobile called the Lada. That car was being driven by a Marxist Costa Rican who was trained in Cuba. On December 7 it was in an automobile accident in Honduras after coming from Nicaragua.

The driver of that particular car said that was the second or third trip delivering war material from Nicaragua to El Salvador. I am sure that some of you have seen pictures of the automobile. It looks like a normal automobile that was in an accident and indeed in fact it was in an accident, but I have not taken the liberty of bringing all the graphs and all the pictures on the floor of the House, but they are outside in the Speaker's lobby.

It shows there are about seven secret compartments in that automobile filled with military equipment. On the floor outside the vehicle, this is a chart of some of the military equipment that was found inside that automobile, driving from Nicaragua to El Salvador for the express purpose of undermining the democratic regime in that country. Some of the equipment that was in that car had 450 pounds of military hardware and military equipment.

□ 1515

The photo cannot show it all, but there were 7,000 rounds of ammunition in that one Lada car. There were 21 grenades, 86 blasting caps, $27,400 of American cash. The car also contained 39 computer-generated encryption pads for coded communications, accompanied by a letter with instructions from the headquarters of the El Salvadoran Communist insurgents giving instructions to the guerrillas inside El Salvador.

There are some people who say there is really no connection between the regime in Nicaragua and the regime in El Salvador; that Nicaragua really wants to be left alone. It does not. You can listen to what their leaders are saying, and they simply are saying, "It is a revolution without borders and we are aiming at Mexico." That is the real prize. It is not just the Central American countries. It is Mexico itself. And if Central America goes Marxist-Leninist, if Central America becomes a totalitarian country, Mexico is going to be under great pressure. That will be next, and what type of United States are we going to have? Are we going to have the Rapid Deployment Force next to or inside the gentleman's State of Texas?

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DELAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to point out when we met with the Vice President of Nicaragua Sergio Ramirez, and asked him about this vehicle, he sort of had a little glint in his eye and his lip kind of turned up a little bit, and he said, "We do not know about this vehicle. Did it not have Costa Rican license plates on it?"

We responded, "Yes, it did," and he said, "Well, there is your answer. That is obviously a vehicle from Costa Rica."

Mr. COURTER. The driver admitted that was not his first movement of supplies from Nicaragua into El Salvador.

During the debate I heard basically four main arguments as to why the United States should not support the Democratic resistance.

No. 1, I heard the argument that it is $100 million, it is too much money, we cannot affort it, we have Gramm-Rudman, we have a large deficit, and we should not send that type of money to the Americas or some country down there.

With all due respect, I have never heard that argument, or rarely heard that argument, made by those people who now criticize that a $100 million is too much, criticizing $5 billion being sent to the Middle East almost on an annualized basis. If $5 billion is sufficient and adequate and necessary and important, and I believe it is, to help Israel and the peace process in the Middle East, if $5 billion on an annualized basis is not too much money to sent to countries 7,000 miles away, how is $100,000 million sent to a country inside the Americas too much money? It simply is not.

I also heard the argument that the Democratic resistance in Nicaragua cannot win, but it is simply a self-fulfilling philosophy. The argument is that they are not doing that well militarily, they are not that well trained, they are not having that much military success at the present time, even though their numbers are increasing dramatically, but it seems to me that the reason they are not doing as well militarily is, in fact, because they have not been supported by democracies, they have not been supported by the United States.

Also, I have heard the argument, and this is the third main argument, that we should try negotiations. We have tried negotiations. We have spoken directly to the leaders of Nicaragua. Nicaragua has turned its back on the Contadora objectives. One of the main objectives of the Contadora was to have internal reconciliation inside Nicaragua; that is, Nicaraguans talking to Nicaraguans. They have refused to do so. Why should we go back to the days of a failed policy?

Does anybody in this Chamber seriously believe that through adroit and clever negotiations, we can democratize Nicaragua, we can turn them from Communist totalitarians into Democrats? I do not believe there is one person in this world who actually believes that cleaver and slick diplomacy is going to change what that country is today.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, how much time do we have remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] that he has 2 hours and 34½ minutes remaining.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. How much time does the other side have remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The other side has 3 hours.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, at this time I will reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] for 1 hour.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this brief time to me.

Mr. Chairman, when I came into the Congress, I was and remain so, committed to the reordering of the priorities of America. We cannot and must not make war, militarisms, and the stockpiling of weapons a priority over our domestic needs.

Today, we once again debate the priorities of America. How can we possibly give $100 million to the Contras while in just my city of Baltimore alone, almost 50,000 people are on a waiting list for safe, sound, sanitary housing. Does it make sense to give $100 million to the Contras while in my city of Baltimore, which grapples with the problem of crime and delinquency, there will be few if any Federal moneys to fight these problems.

One hundred million dollars to the Contras while in my city of Baltimore and in many other urban areas, health care needs cannot be met. One hundred million dollars to the Contras while in our urban areas, the unemployed remain almost hopeless because this administration says we cannot afford a Federal jobs program.

The argument will be raised that the $100 million is coming out of the Department of Defense, and this is true. But it makes my point that the military budget is still so bloated that large sums could be transferred from the military budget to domestic programs without in any way weakening our national security. Such a transfer will not be approved by this Congress, but there are those who will seek the transfer to aid a failing futile policy toward Nicaragua.

Let me take a few more minutes to speak to our international policies. Tragically, we continue to follow a foreign policy based on militarism, interventionalism, and misplaced support. Each time we have supported the wrong government, the wrong forces, we have ended up the loser—China, Iran, and Marcos. Our concern over the spread of communism has, in my opinion, caused us to make serious blunders in our international strategies—and we pay the price for those blunders.

In closing, let me raise the question; $100 million to the Contras leads to U.S. military observers. Does this lead to another Vietnam?

SOME FACTS ON BALTIMORE CITY HOUSING

There are 17,000 units of public housing in Baltimore.

Over 40,000 families are on the waiting list.

No new construction in over 5 years.

Section 202 elderly/handicapped units have declined from 144 units in 1984 to 49 units in 1985.

By 1987, CDBG cuts could reduce services to 84,000 low- and moderate-income families.

JOB TRAINING

The most recent unemployment figure for Baltimore city—January 1986—stands at 5.6 percent.

Job training programs in Baltimore have received the largest cumulative funding cuts of any city program during the Reagan administration.

Overall funding for job training has been reduced by 80 percent.

Summer youth programs have been reduced from 17,000 in 1979 to 6,500 in 1985. Over 40,000 poor teenagers looking for summer jobs.

Due to layoffs at GE, Montgomery Ward, Black & Decker, Allied Chemical, Western Electric, and Bethlehem Steel, there are currently 2,500 displaced workers in Baltimore.

By 1987, over 1,800 low-income residents could be denied training and employment services for job placement under the JTPA Disadvantaged Youth and Adults Program; 1,600 youths could be eliminated under the JTPA Summer Youth Program; 385 fewer displace workers would be served under the JTPA Displaced Workers Program.

EDUCATION

Of the total 51,000 eligible students, only 36,000 students in Baltimore City receive supplemental services funded under chapter I, Disadvantaged Student Program. This program will lose approximately $159 billion this year due to Gramm-Rudman.

Programs for handicapped students in Baltimore are underfunded at $4 million.

By 1987, 8,438 fewer disadvantaged children would be served by chapter I; 4,922 fewer students would be served by vocational education funding; and 184 fewer adults would be served by adult education funds.

HEALTH

The total number of persons living in poverty in Baltimore City stands at 23 percent; 7,500 Baltimoreans are currently enrolled in the Medicaid Program; 87,500 Baltimore City residents are being served by the 7 community health centers which are threatened with extinction; 10,000 homeless persons are being served by aid for the homeless in Baltimore through FEMA.

By 1987, cuts in the maternal and child health block grants would result in 6,500 fewer patients and 25,000 fewer patients visits; and family planning cuts would result in 2,900 patients and 6,000 fewer patient visits.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STUDDS].

Mr. STUDDS. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, it is a tribute to the American political system that the United States can adopt and carry out a policy that is brutal, illegal, and ineffective and then devote 10 full hours debating whether to do more of it.

By ignoring the pleas of Latin American democrats and submitting this proposal now;

By including military aid;

By emphasizing the role of the CIA;

By using harsh and exaggerated rhetoric;

And by mischaracterizing both the supporters and the opponents of Nicaragua's Government;

The administration has missed an opportunity to unite this country and our regional allies in effective support of Democratic change.

While seeking to isolate undemocratic Nicaragua, the administration has—in a hemisphere of democracies—isolated only itself.

While pompously proclaiming a bold new doctrine it has said will change the course of history; the administration has instead repeated the oldest, tiredest, and saddest mistake in the history of our relations with the Latin world.

The administration admits that regional support is essential if its policy is to succeed. Yet, eight Latin American foreign ministers came to Washington to urge the President not to submit this plan to Congress; the new President of Costa Rica has denounced it; Honduras has refused to serve further as a conduit for Contra aid; and not a single Latin head of state has expressed public support.

The administration says we should disregard what Latin leaders publicly say, and heed instead what we are told they privately believe.

The lesson administration officials would have us learn is that the public statements of elected leaders can, in the name of democracy, be ignored; for they are uttered merely for home consumption, reflecting only the beliefs of the people by whom these leaders were elected, and in whose name they serve. Such a lesson is for dictators to learn, not democrats; for if we truly wish to see democracy extend throughout Latin America, we had better learn to care what the people of the region believe, and the people of the region could find better uses by far for $100 million than this extreme and extravagant package of military aid.

The fact is that our Nicaragua policy will never succeed until it sheds these shackles of extremism; until its message rings as true to those picking coffee in the fields of Nicaragua as it does to those sipping coffee at the Heritage Foundation.

The administration is asking us to give up; for that is what it means to believe that only the CIA can save Nicaragua; that only violence can bring peace; that only civil war can unite the Nicaraguan people.

These are the assumptions of defeatists; they are not true.

The slogans of desk-bound, self-elected, self-described fighters for freedom cannot substitute for an understanding of Nicaraguan history; or sensitivity to the suffering of the Nicaraguan people; or an appreciation of the courage, the intelligence, and the strength of those who have never left Nicaragua—who reside now some within, but many more outside, the government—and who have the potential, with our encouragement, to still make the promises of the Nicaraguan revolution come true.

For the real foes of freedom within Nicaragua are few in number, weak in popular support, dependent on foreign assistance, and without diplomatic or political skills. They can be isolated; they can, in time, be defeated. Their success so far is a tribute primarily to the blunders of our own administration, and to the distrust and disrespect in which the leaders of the Contras are held by the people whose interests they purport to serve.

In the name of law, history, justice, effectiveness, humanity, and common sense, let us vote down this proposal today, and begin tomorrow the task we should have started years ago—of helping Nicaragua become not necessarily what we want it to be, and certainly not what Fidel Castro would like it to be, but instead what the people of Nicaragua, themselves, determine that it should be.

The opportunity is before us. Latin American democrats, Members of both parties in this Congress, and the majority of the American people are ready to unite. We have only to put aside the counsel of extremists and to heed the lessons of history; to substitute determined diplomacy for brutal military intervention; to shift the spotlight of world attention from the mistakes of our Government to those of Nicaragua; and to hold out to the Nicaraguan people the promise of a better future, rather than the reminder of a bitter past.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Nevada [Mr. REID].

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, we who are charged with allocating the foreign aid moneys of the American people are used to criticism. In the spirit of free and open public debate guaranteed by our Constitution, this is as it should be.

But spirited debate involving the actions of this body should not include threats, nor should it include insidious innuendo that questions one's loyalty to country.

Unfortunately—not only for Congress, but for the American people—the debate surrounding this aid package has taken on a tone reminiscent of the cold war years.

In some cases, one can hardly discern the harsh style of propaganda used by those who support aid to the Contras from that of even the Sandinista government itself.

Last week, I received two letters from the National Conservative Political Action Committee urging me to support this aid package. In saying I was urged, I am being kind.

In fact, the vicious tone of this correspondence in falsely alleging my support of communism was surpassed only by its lack of courage in failing to directly accuse me of being a Communist sympathizer.

Enclosed in one letter was a nail—apparently for me to drive into the: "coffin of liberty and democracy for the Nicaraguan people" if I vote against this aid.

I would submit that those who hold liberty and democracy dear would hardly stoop to such a soiled use of their freedom of speech.

I would like to read a brief excerpt of my response to Mr. Terry Dolan, head of Nick-Pack:

Mr. DOLAN: I received your letter in which you imply that unless I agree to provide one hundred million dollars of taxpayer's money for the use of Nicaraguan guerillas, I am a tacit—if not an outright—supporter of communism.

As you are no doubt aware, I have consistently supported resistance to Communist aggression in Afghanistan, Cambodia and elsewhere—and I will continue to do so whenever I believe the money is well spent in the defense of democracy.

On the other hand, the Contra movement you espouse has been repudiated by our friends and allies in Central and South America as playing directly into the hands of Daniel Ortega and his fellow Communists.

I agree with them, and with the certified conservative Senator Nancy Kassebaum, whom you have endorsed in the past and who has decried attacks such as yours on the patriotism of the opponents of this aid package.

As for your promise to inform my constituents of my vote, it might interest you to know that I'll be running for the U.S. Senate this year.

As you'll remember, in 1982, Nick-Pack suported Jim Santini in the Democratic primary in Nevada against Howard Cannon. Mister Santini repudiated your support and later said that Senator Cannon was the total beneficiary of your efforts.

In any case, I certainly don't give in to threats, and in response to your question about how I'll vote, I'll do what I always do: I'll vote for what I believe is right.

Sincerely,

HARRY REID,
Member of Congress.

We in Congress support freedom and democracy, regardless of our party affiliation. This is not a partisan matter.

And this aid package should not be a litmus test of our patriotism. We may disagree with funding the Contras, but we are working to contain communism, not only in this hemisphere, but in farflung reaches of the world.

We all want to contain communism. It is in our methodology that we differ.

It is because I believe this is not sound policy that I am voting against this aid package—not because I am unpatriotic, as the Nick-Packs of the world would have the American people believe. I urge my colleagues to join me in this opposition.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARKEY].

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the resolution.

The new democratic tide in Latin America that President Reagan speaks about will not be advanced by the Contras.

Half of the problems in Nicaragua today come from President Reagan's attempt to put yesterday's people back in power there. Let there be no mistake that the military command of the Contras is packed with Somoza thugs. We aren't trying to send Marcos back to the Philippines. We aren't trying to send Duvalier back to Haiti. So why are we trying to send Somoza's men back to Nicaragua?

Well, the President is making a last-gasp effort to revive the policy of global containment. But the American people, remembering 15 wrenching years and 50,000 American deaths in Vietnam, won't let their sons and brothers go off to die in another dirty little war unless vital interests are clearly at stake. President Reagan's rhetoric hasn't convinced anyone that tiny Nicaragua is a real threat to our Nation. So the administration is attempting to end run—using surrogates to do the dirty work for us.

Are we entering the era of Reagan Quixote, willing to saddle up with forces like the Contras, anywhere in the world? I look at our foreign policy and I think the administration has lost the reins.

We must not follow a doctrine that says: "If you've got a war, we've got the guns."

If covert war is going to replace overt diplomacy, we may as well shut down the State Department. Or perhaps, just perhaps, we could work out a foreign policy that builds upon the regional consensus of Contadora, and respects the noblest aspirations of the Central American people.

But if the President chooses to go on a binge with freedom fighter firewater, he's going to wake up with a nasty, real world hangover.

Central America is already reeling from that hangover; 15,000 heavily armed men are running around the countryside in Central America, committing terror. They're not going to bring the Sandinistas down, but they're scaring the wits out of a lot of innocent peasants. And not just in Nicaragua. Many people in Honduras are more than a little nervous about this Contra army based in their country.

Let me tell you a secret. The Contras aren't fighting to prevent arms getting out of Nicaragua. They aren't fighting to reform the Sandinista government. And they aren't fighting to lift censorship of La Prensa.

They are fighting to take over that country, and they are doing it in a very brutal way. But they can't win without direct military involvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DELAY. Would the gentleman ask for time and yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The time is controlled by the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DELAY. I would just like to point out to the gentleman, and I will not yield because he would not get his own time, the gentleman says that the Contras are "packed" with Somocistas that used to fight for Somoza.

Would it be interesting to note that out of the 153 leaders in the FDN, only 41 are from the old Somoza National Guard, 23 of those are the young officers, not the leaders of Somoza's National Guard; 18 of them are soldiers that were very young men at the time of Somoza that are only young officers at the present time.

So they are not packed with Somoza's National Guard, and that is a misleading statement. Furthermore Mr. Robello, Mr. Cruz, and Mr. Calero, the Contra leaders, all opposed Somoza.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE].

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the resolution to provide $100 million in American taxpayer funds to the Contras.

Mr. Chairman, let us be very clear at the outset that those of us who oppose this resolution agree with its supporters that America does in fact have critical interests at stake in Central America. We have a definite political interest in seeing an end to violations of human rights by the Nicaraguan Government and in advancing the cause of democracy and pluralism in Nicaragua. We have an important strategic interest in insuring that no country in Central America becomes a base for the projection of Soviet or Cuban military power in our hemisphere, or ever permits the placement of weapons that could directly threaten our Nation. We certainly have an important economic interest in fostering the strongest possible commercial relations with our neighbors to the south. And we have a clear humanitarian interest in assisting all of Latin America in overcoming the tragic poverty and injustice that have taken a terrible human toll over so many decades.

The only real question we are facing today is: How can these interests best be advanced? Very simply, those of us who oppose the $100 million requested by the President are convinced that there is virtually no action that this Congress could take that would do greater damage to American interests in Central America or would provide more explosive material for Soviet and Cuban propagandists. And at a time when we are asking our own citizens to accept very painful cuts in vital domestic programs—cuts in job training and housing and health care and education—it is unconscionable that we are even contemplating wasting American tax dollars on such an ill-conceived foreign policy.

It is most unfortunate that the President's characterization of the situation in Central America has simply ignored a number of significant elements and facts that must be understood if we hope to both advance the cause of democracy in Nicaragua and serve American interests in the region.

First, we must acknowledge the fact that the Contras are anything but a homogeneous, ideologically committed, democratic resistance and the repeated use of anti-Communist slogans and labels cannot transform this tragic reality. Certainly there are some Nicaraguans genuinely committed to democratic values who are now part of the Contra forces. But the fact remains that the majority of the key military leaders of the Contras come from the despised national guard, known for their widespread brutality under the repressive Somoza dictatorship. The administration has itself acknowledged that at least 9 of the 13 military leaders of the Contra high command are former national guardsmen—Col. Enrique Bermudez, supreme commander; Lt. Walter "Tono" Calderon, theater commander; Lt. Harley "Venando" Pinchardo, personnel commander; Lt. Rodolpho "Invisible" Ampie, intelligence commander; Lt. Louis "Mike Lima" Moreno, operations commander; Carlos "Pajarito" Guillen, special operations, Nicaragua; Capt. Juan Gomez, air commander; Maj. Donald "Toro" Torres, counterintelligence commander; and Lt. "Roberto", artillery commander. There is no more certain way to rally popular Nicaraguan support for the Sandinista government than by allying ourselves with elements so closely identified with the deposed and hated Somoza regime. Edgar Chamorro, himself a former leader of one of the principal Contra forces, has publicly admitted that the Contras are controlled and directed by ex-national guardsmen and that the Contra forces routinely engage in brutal acts of civilian mutilation, murder, torture, and rape. These unspeakable atrocities committed by the Contras have undermined whatever hope they may have had for garnering sympathy and support within Nicaragua. And our alliance with these ruthless forces seriously compromises American credibility and effectiveness in the region and plays directly into the hands of Soviet and Cuban propagandists who would like nothing more than to portray the United States as allied with this sort of violence and brutality.

The people who are bringing us the Contras today are the very same folks who brought us Ferdinand Marcos—both packaged and sold under the same deceptive label. Haven't we learned that we do nothing but violence to American traditions and American interests when we tie ourselves to those who do not share our Nation's proud values and traditions, but who simply manipulate the labels and slogans of anticommunism? When we allow ourselves to be manipulated in this way, we seriously endanger American interests. To continue our support for the Contras, as we did for Marcos long after it was clear that his was a horridly corrupt and doomed regime, opposed to everything that our country stands for, is folly—pure and simple. The only sure result of this policy is that it will mobilize the Nicaraguan population in defense of Nicaraguan sovereignty and the Sandinista government. And the only sure winners will be the Soviets and the Cubans.

Second, another critical point curiously omitted in public statements made by President Reagan, is that nearly every single one of our closest friends and allies in this hemisphere is opposed to American support for the Contras. If American interests are truly to be protected, it is basic common sense that we listen carefully to the advice of our friends in the region who in fact share many of our concerns about the Nicaraguan Government. The countries closest to the conflict—Mexico, Colombia, Panama, Venezuela, Argentina, Brazil, Peru, and Uruguay—have warned us explicitly that giving money and guns to the Contras is a terrible mistake. In fact, the foreign ministers of these eight nations came to Washington recently to plead directly with Secretary of State Schultz to end our involvement with the Contra forces and to join with these Latin American nations in negotiating a regional solution to the conflicts in Central America. These nations are telling us that aid to the Contras will only serve to escalate tensions in the region, foster increased instability that would threaten these other democratic governments, reduce American influence, and directly undermine efforts to promote truly democratic principles in Central America. This is the reality, Mr. President, whether or not it fits into your picture of events in the region. In this world, the real world, our Government is virtually alone in insisting upon continuing down this treacherous path of support for the Contra forces. In the end, we will find that it is not the Sandinistas that will be isolated, but the United States.

Let there be no doubt as to where the administration's Central American policies are taking us. The administration has attempted to sell this policy on the grounds that we face a choice between military aid now or U.S. troops later. Mr. Chairman, the American people know, and I believe the majority of us here well know, that this is not the full truth. The fact is that our Government is engaged in the buildup of a permanent military presence in Central America right now and additional aid to the Contras is only another step in the escalation of America's military involvement in the region and the steady march toward war.

Let us halt this march right now. Let us abandon this dangerous and self-defeating policy. And let us act to put America's tremendous economic and political power behind efforts to work in concert with all of our friends and staunchest allies in the region to produce a lasting, negotiated solution to the problems in Central America.

Mr. Chairman, for all the reasons I have outlined above, we must, in good conscience, reject unequivocally the President's request for military assistance to the Contras.

The President, in making this proposal, has in fact avoided the critically hard choice that we face on this issue.

The President knows, the Secretary of State knows and this House knows that $100 million in military and material assistance to the Contras is wholly insufficient either to achieve significant progress on the ground or to induce a diplomatic, political solution to the conflict in Nicaragua. On the contrary, approval of this resolution would both prolong the agony of the Contras, condemning them to a delayed and painful defeat, and would harden the resolve of the Sandinistas, provoking them to further outrages against their own people and Nicaragua's neighbors—potentially expanding the war in Central America.

Mr. Chairman, if the threat posed by the Nicaraguan Government to the national security interests of the United States is so paramount, if the threat to the security of this hemisphere is so overriding, then it is incumbent on the President to request from Congress a declaration of war against Nicaragua.

This is an issue that demands from the President, and from us, the most compelling honesty with the American people and with our allies in the Americas. Our future is at stake here, no matter how we proceed.

I believe that we are today embarked on a dangerous course. Our objectives are not clearly defined, our tactics not resolved, our diplomacy not effectively executed. This is a prescription for failure. We are on the brink of sliding inexorably into a major involvement in Nicaragua without letting the American people, or their elected officials, honestly determine whether we indeed want to fight a war in that country.

The American people deserve better from us and from their President. They deserve to know precisely what we want to achieve, why we must attain it, and how we must go about it. And if indeed the Nicaraguan Government poses a mortal threat to our national security, as the administration contends, then the American people deserve a referendum on the question of war or peace in Nicaragua.

The President should match his military daring with some political courage. If indeed he wants to pursue military conquest in Nicaragua, to defeat the Sandinistas and to replace their regime with a new government, then he should ask the Congress for a declaration of war.

I have no doubt as to how the American people would respond, and those who vigorously oppose any military involvement in Nicaragua, as I do, should not fear the constitutional exercise of power by the Congress. But we should all fear the unbridled exercise of covert authority, without accountability, by the Executive. The American people do not want to go to war in Nicaragua, and the President knows it. The United States should not be dragged into a war in Nicaragua without the consent of the American people.

It is time to place the issue squarely before the country. It is time for honesty, truth and intelligent choices worthy of our democracy—and not deception, evasions and policies doomed to failure and recrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Does the gentleman from California desire time?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve at this time.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 mintues to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER].

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said on this subject by so many that I am reluctant to add to it, but I join the debate because tomorrow, March 20, 1986, will be an historic day in the history of our country and in the history of the Congress of the United States.

Tomorrow the Congress will choose whether or not to widen the war in Central America or whether or not to begin, I think for the first time, a genuine and sincere attempt to end the war in Central America by the political process, not by the process of violence.

What if, what if President Reagan wins the vote here in the House tomorrow. What will happen? The Contras, now relatively quiescent, will be envigorated. The violence and killing will escalate.

The Contadora peace process will suffer a devastating body blow, and after the midterm elections of this year, President Reagan will be back to ask for more money.

At that point, the President will argue, as Presidents have before him—specifically, our own Democratic President Lyndon Johnson—that we had made too great an investment, too large a sacrifice in Central America to turn back, and I know that the parallels with Vietnam are tiresome and somewhat hackneyed, but I believe that they are not overstated. They are accurate and they are important.

All of this—the direction in which our country will go, hinges on us in the House tomorrow. So now is the time to fashion a political and not a military solution. Why? Because, Mr. Chairman, there is no military solution. There is no military answer to the problem in Central America.

One hundred million dollars is not enough to topple the Sandinista government. There is not the kind of widespread popular support that the Contras require to be victorious in Nicaragua. They do not enjoy that popular support in their own country; they do not enjoy it in ours.

The Sandinistas, an army of more than 60,000, will not be defeated by a Contra arm of about 8,000. Now is the time for us to support our neighbors in the region who have endorsed the Contadora talks. The time for peace is now, the chance is ours if we seize it.

If our neighbors are willing to sit down with the Sandinistas and negotiate, why aren't we?

If we defeat the President's request for $100 million tomorrow, Mr. Chairman, the security of the United States will not be threatened by this tiny and impoverished nation of 2.8 million souls. But unless we defeat the President's request tomorrow, the prospects for peace will surely be extinguished.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, the last several speakers have talked about Nicaragua Government. We have not heard one speaker on that side of the aisle say anything about the Soviet threat that is there. We have not heard one speaker say anything about the thousands of Cubans, about the hundreds of other Soviet bloc advisers.

Let me ask the gentleman in the well: Is he concerned that there is an evolving, growing, massive Soviet military threat in Nicaragua or not?

□ 1545

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield an additional 30 seconds to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I say to my colleague and friend from Pennsylvania, I am concerned about the presence of Soviet and Cuban advisers in Nicaragua, all of us are. But we know there is one way to guarantee more Russians and more Cubans in Nicaragua; fund the Contras. What will the Nicaraguas do? They will have no choice but to turn to the Soviets, turn to the Cubans to ask for more military assistance.

The Reagan approach is a guarantee for more bloodshed and is guarantee inevitably that the presence of American troops from Allentown and Bethlehem and all over the Lehigh Valley will be called upon to die in Nicaragua.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I address this to the gentleman from Bucks County, PA: That is the best way to ensure the eventual use of American troops is to nothing, is to let that threat evolve to the state at which it really approaches Mexico and the United States and at that point you will be sending people from Doylestown.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DELAY. The threat has been building because we have not been giving aid for 2 years and the Soviet threat has been increasing.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. ROEMER. I thank my colleague for yielding. Should we be surprised that the illegitimate government of Nicaragua represses its own people? Or that it pursues a policy of genocide against the Indians on its east coast? Or that it proclaims and practices a policy of exporting Communist revolution to other countries in the region? Or that it receives huge sums of military aid from Russia and Cuba? Or that it allows and encourages its territory to be a safe haven for terrorists? Or that it brutalizes the truth in its attempts to manipulate the media in the free world? Should we be surprised?

Of course not. Remember the lessons of history, taught first by Lenin of the Soviet Union and then by Castro, to name just two: the revolution is the thing, not freedom, not liberty, not decency. The people's interests mean nothing. The Communist dictatorship of the left in Nicaragua will not voluntarily concede pluralism or justice or peace any more than the Somoza dictatorship of the right voluntarily acquiesced to any of those. It is not in the nature of a totalitarian state to do so.

Knowing this and realizing that their terror is a threat to all peace-loving people everywhere on Earth should be enough to make us realize that we must use every rational means to tell the world and to inform the Sandinistas that Cuba, Jr., in Central America will not be tolerated. We must keep the pressure on Nicaragua to change. That pressure includes both diplomatic strokes and military assistance to the Contras. One without the other is inadequate. it is a messy, difficult moment in our history, but a decision is unavoidable. We must not play the ostrich.

We must be freedom's eagle.

Military aid to the Contras should be approved. The Contras are far, far from perfect. As a recent editorial said, however, not all Contras are Democrats, but all Democrats in Nicaragua are Contras.

Are we assured of victory? Are there no risks? Victory is neither assured nor riskless, it never is. But I would rather send our money now than our men later.

Of all our choices, the option we must not take is the option of doing nothing. That is a certain loser for the people of Nicaragua and of America.

I ask my colleagues to approve the President's plan; make it better, but not be guilty of congressional paralysis. Let it not be said in history that this Congress could best be described by four words: too little, too late.

Act, act now.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE CHAIRMAN

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind all persons in the gallery that they are here as guests of the House and that any manifestation of approval or disapproval of proceedings is in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Member from Minnesota [Mr. OBERSTAR].

Mr. OBERSTAR. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the issue in Nicaragua is not whether we oppose communism. We oppose communism. The issue is whether we will adhere to our own principles of democracy. Our vote for or against the President's $100 million aid package must be judged on whether it is right, measured by our own democratic tradition; whether it will be effective, measured against the administration's goal of military overthrow of the current Nicaraguan Government; and whether we can afford this expenditure while slashing funds for domestic programs to reduce our domestic deficit.

If Nicaragua and the Sandinistas are the military threat the President claims, an argument which borders on the absurd, then he should mobilize the necessary military force and act decisively rather than hire these discredited mercenaries loosely called Contras.

The administration will not act frontally, openly, because to do so——

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is being harrassed by these people. He has not recognized them. The House should be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will be in order. The gentleman from Minnesota has the time.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I do not yield.

The administration will not act frontally and openly because to do so would be to require the President to ask the Congress for a declaration of war which would manifestly be rejected. A more rational approach was outlined by an editorial in the small-town newspaper in my district, the Hibbing Daily Tribune, which said, "Why not give the peace initiatives in Nicaragua a chance? Why support a hopeless war when our best chance in that nation is to bring it back under our sphere rather than pushing it away?

"The President says he is a Contra. Unfortunately the Contras have shown themselves to be one of the most inhumane groups of people assembled in the Americas. The President is making an emotional appeal on an issue that we should be dealing with in a very clearheaded fashion." That is a sensible call for reason and rationality and balanced approach to a very fundamental problem in the Americas. We invaded Nicaragua twice. We gave them Samoza. The people of Nicaragua recognize we gave them 30 years of military suppression. They do not want more of it. Reject the aid package, reject America using mercenaries to go to war against the Nicaraguan people.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman from Minnesota again mentioned the Nicaraguan threat and the Sandinista threat. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota does he accept the reality of a Soviet-Cuban threat within Nicaragua and that that is the basis of so many of our arguments? We are not concerned about a country of 3 million people. We are concerned about Nicaragua being built into a major Soviet-Cuban base to subvert its neighbors, the region, and to threaten the United States of America.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RITTER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OBERSTAR. If that is the gentleman's concern, why does not the administration go after the source, Cuba and the Soviet Union?

Mr. RITTER. Does the gentleman propose making war on Cuba and the Soviet Union?

Mr. OBERSTAR. That is what the gentleman is asking for.

Mr. RITTER. No, I am not.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10½ minutes.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding, my friend from California.

And I will try to be very brief.

I was enthralled by the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota about us making war against the Nicaraguan people. The Government of Nicaragua had a Comrade Bayardo Arce Castano, vice coordinator of the executive commission attending the Soviet Congress in Moscow on March 3, the 27th Communist Party Soviet Union Congress. He addressed the Congress over there in Moscow. Among the laudatory things he said about Comrade Gorbachev, he said, "Our people, Government, and the Sandinista Front fully approve the precepts of the new edition of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union program. We are convinced that our duty is to mobilize state, political, and public forces throughout the world to implement the proposals of the General Secretary of the Communist Party Soviet Union Central Committee which the Congress has ardently supported."

Now if the gentleman identifies that kind of talk with the poor people of Nicaragua, then the gentleman is welcome to that opinion. But that is communism, Marxism, Leninism in action, attending the Soviet Congress. And I believe for the people—I have not yielded.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. OBERSTAR. The issue is not what was said in Moscow, the issue is whether we will send $100 million.

Mr. HYDE. Well, in any event, the gentleman identifies this kind of talk with the people of Nicaragua and I believe for the people of Nicaragua.

One last thing which has just come to my attention, that Gen. George Washington had been a member of the British Army before the Revolutionary War. That makes him sort of a Somocista, a pre-Somocista switch hitter.

And I suppose we had better rip his name out of the history books. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Yes, unfortunately, George Washington was a Contra-George III.

Now this debate I think has shown the finest of our House. It started to get off to a bad start as though some of us on this side of the aisle were questioning because there were some voices raised around our country questioning the judgment of people in here, that we were questioning patriotism. I do not even question the judgment of some of our Members given the body of facts that they work with. What I do question, and I hope nobody wants to take down my words, I have weighed this, I do not think it is an insult, I question your sense of urgency. I am going to try to leave time for one of the best debaters in this House, my colleague from California, Mr. DELLUMS, to engage in a colloquy on some of the points about international law. But a subject I asked to speak about today with my leadership is the religious persecution of my church. This happens to be the second anniversary of the "Dear Commandante" letter. I thought my good friend, STEVE SOLARZ, delivered an interesting debating solid blow against one of the scholars on our side of the aisle, Mr. GINGRICH, by pulling out a letter that Mr. GINGRICH had written to the Soviet Premier, one of those who dies in the last few years, saying, "What is wrong with writing to somebody?" I never found fault with that.

I sign many of your letters on religious persecution to the heads of Communist governments in Romania, right to the head shed of the Kremlin itself. But 2 years ago many of you wrote, including your distinguished majority leader, and you expressed fond hopes of what you thought, general advice, of what you thought the Communists down there should do. They have dashed your hopes.

Now we have, a far cry, I might tell some of the freshmen and second-termers on this side of the aisle and that side of the aisle, we have come a far cry from when one of our distinguished colleagues who stood right here, and I will not mention names because he has gone on to what some think higher glory somewhere else, but he said that his dealings with the Sandinistas had shown him, and this was only 3 years ago, that they were the moral equivalent of the Boy Scouts of America. And then he spared us going down what some of us learned in school: Trustworthy, obedient, and eventually getting to the word "reverent."

Now please let me as a practicing Catholic—I make no claims to being devout, as some people had across this country in the last couple of years in our political system. People who are devout generally do not know they are devout. I am just saying that I am loyal. I try to be.

Now when I sat with three priests of my religion Friday in the curia office in Managua, I asked each of them for the benefit of the eight other Congressmen I was with how many years each of them had been a priest of God, and it tallied up to 54 years. One was a cardinal, one was a young bishop names Vivas, and the other was a young priest who had had the great responsibility of running Radio Catolica until it was taken away by force from him on January 1.

Now the sense of urgency that some of us do not feel in this body is rooted right in that religious persecution. I am going to give my colleagues on both sides of the aisle who are not with the President, I am going to give you an arithmetic problem where you must question the honor of a young liberal woman in our Embassy, since assigned elsewhere in the world, who teamed up with a young conservative lady in our Embassy. Both of these ladies happen to be practicing Catholics. And they did a survey of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua.

□ 1600

And they came up with the figure of 912 priests, nuns, monks, foreign and domestic. And they surveyed as best they could that 912. It took them over 2 years to do this. And they came up with the figure of 860 loyal to the Holy Father in Rome to the 10 bishops down there, 860 out of 912. That left 52 in the so-called popular church. I happened to interview bishops like Walsh, who spent 30 years in prison because he would not in Communist China in days of yore, would not join the popular church. There are still priests and bishops, Chinese priests and bishops of the Catholic Church, in prison in Communist China as we move along down this path of détente that we are trying to work out with the Communists in China.

Of these 52, Cardinal Obando y Bravo, who I have said from this well I believe is the most courageous man in this hemisphere, said that only 10 of them were native born Nicaraguans.

Now, Congressman HYDE has discussed Father Molina with his big mural behind the alter with Jesus Christ holding an AK-47. I think that in and of itself is blasphemous. This is the same Jesus who took the soldier's ear and placed it back on his head when it was cut off by the sword of St. Peter. This is the Prince of Peace who has recommended not warfare even in the moment when He was being asked to give his life for all of us.

This arithmetic problem was corrected for me just Friday of last week by these three priests, a cardinal, a bishop and Father Bismarck Carballo. He said 860 is more like 840, and the popular church is not even 52; it is about 40 or 45.

Now, these people in that 45 are the ones who meet with the religious left of my church and all the church denominations down there and gives them the grand revolutionary tour. They do not want to hear about the turbus devinis, the miscalled divine mobs, who will beat the cardinal, then archbishop's automobile to a total wreck. I said, "Maybe they did not know it was your car, your eminence." He said, "I was sitting in it." I said, "Well, maybe they did not know you were their bishop." He said, "I had my red robes on."

Cardinal O'Conner of New York told me after mass just Monday, St. Patrick's Day, that he believes that Cardinal Obando y Bravo was in danger of being martyred right here on the continent of North American, the hatred is that intense.

Let me tell you about this Father Bismarck Carballo. Just last year, he was set up with a woman in a room where they were going to try to take compromising pictures of him. He fought. They never were able to get those pictures. But they forced him to strip at gunpoint, dragged him out in the street, and then put him being run naked down the street on television. He has been beaten up.

And one of the second level of commandantes, the first nine never heard a gunshot fired in this revolution—there is no Eden Pastoras heroes of the revolution in that group. But at the second level, I will give this man credit for fighting Somoza in the hills. His name is Lenin Cerna. Either his mother was prescient or he assumed this name. But Commandante Lenin Cerna told Father Bismarck Carballo on January 1 of this year, "I am going to kill you, Father, if it is the last thing I do."

Now the persecution of the Protestant Evangelicals is such that I implore you to meet in the Rayburn room as about 40 Members have done this morning a gentleman named Prudentia Baltadona. He has his ears reconstructed by several reconstructive plastic surgery operations. You can still see the slit on this throat where they tried to cut his juggler, but instead they cut his carotid artery. They hung him from a tree Nazi style. We have all seen the pictures of what the Gestapo used to do to people at the foot of trees. And one of the Sandinista soldiers there said, "Shall we shoot him? A higher official said, "No," sticking the bayonet in the wound on his throat. You can see the keloid scar. He opened up the wound and said "No, you see, I slit his throat and he is going to die."

As they turned and left him, and this is an important point, they had forced him to dress in Contra clothes. As they turned to leave, Prudentia—he is being very prudent. He is not in politics. He is waiting outside there to see us—they said, "Now let's see if your God will save your life." Well, God decided he was not to die, and he is here nonpolitically to give testimony to us today.

I do not care whether you impelled to match Father Carballo's story or Minister Prudentia Baltadona's story against stories of your own, the flat out facts are religion is being persecuted and shut down in this tiny nation of Nicaragua.

I beg you, since you all agree now that they are not Boy Scouts, that they are hard-core Communists and that some of them are killers, let us develop a sense of urgency here, so that if the gentleman in the other body from Tennessee is correct that he does not want his sons to die, then let us save the sons of Eden Pastora who, with his 17-year-old daughter, are in combat right now in that small country of Nicaragua.

Read this book.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HEFNER].

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his time.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this argument has kind of deteriorated. It has been a very gentlemanly argument, but everybody despises the Communists. I do not think there is any argument about that.

One of my colleagues from South Carolina made the statement that he hoped that some day his grandson could look back and see whether he had stood with the folks who were the good guys and the ones who had voted against for voting for the Communists.

I have voted for MX missiles. I have voted for our war machines to be a counterbalance to the Soviet Union. And the President has been very strong in his rhetoric as far as the Soviet Union is concerned.

What would be wrong in having some strong rhetoric to the Soviet Union that we are not going to tolerate more gunships coming into Nicaragua, to the Cubans.

Let me just tell you where we are. This debate has been presented that if we do $100 million, then the Communists are going to disappear. Some folks have alluded that it is going to be a long expensive operation, but $100 million solves our problem; $100 million and everything will be OK and we will be able to move along.

Let me tell you we have spent since 1983 $170 million in exercises in Honduras. We spent another $21 million in military construction. We have two permanent airfields and four temporary airfields. Now, sooner or later, in my opinion, the Contras are not going to do the job with $100 million; they ar not going to be able to do it with $200 million or a half a billion dollars or a billion dollars. Sooner or later, they are going to have to have gunships, they are going to have to have sophisticated weapons, because that is what we are fighting against. The Sandinistas have them, absolutely they do.

So when you talk about we are not going to have American people involved in Nicaragua, it seems to me to be missing the point. Whether you go the $100 million or the half a billion dollars for the Contras, sooner or later, if you remove this government, which seems to be the goal, you are going to have to have Americans involved.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 seconds to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina has outlined the scenario of an invasion. That may or may not be what is necessary. But for God's sake, let us give something a chance for those people who are willing to fight for themselves.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, in order to give the gentleman from North Carolina an opportunity to respond, I yield the gentleman 30 seconds.

Mr. HEFNER. The gentleman said, are you advocating an attack on the Soviet Union. The President has called them an evil empire. Why not say to the Soviet Union, "Look, this is in our hemisphere. We don't wish to have any more gunships brought into there." Talk tough to the Russians.

If it is our interest not to have this threat on our hemisphere, sooner or later you will have to face it. Why not face up to it now? Why are you leaving in the hands of 20,000 Contras with $100 million for the security of this Nation?

Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 11 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, 25 years ago, President John F. Kennedy stood on a platform at the east portico of the Capitol, only a few feet from where we are meeting right now, and summoned the American people to "bear the burden of a long twilight struggle." On that occasion, when he was inauguarated as President, John F. Kennedy also issued this warning:

Let all our neighbors know that we shall join with them to oppose aggression or subversion anywhere in the Americas. And let every other power know that this hemisphere intends to remain master of its own house.

The world has turned over many times since that day, but the summons the President issued then is still in force—and still relevant to the times in which we live. If the Sandinista leadership in Nicaragua was content to merely act out of a self-conscious parody of the ideals for which the Nicaraguan people fought in 1979, that would be bad enough. But when that same leadership surrenders the country's sovereignty to act as a surrogate for foreign powers in order to spread the false hope of Communist revolution in neighboring countries, it becomes the vital concern of every person living in this hemisphere.

"This revolution goes beyond our borders," so declared Tomas Borge on July 19, 1981. And so the Sandinistas have acted ever since, in concert with guerrilla groups throughout the hemisphere, and buttresed by the largest amount of Soviet bloc arms and advisors to be introduced in the Caribbean basin since the Cuban missile crisis in 1962.

It's always interesting; of course, to hear a Communist thug talk about the so-called revolution. It's interesting and ironic because Communists always want to sponsor revolutions against everything except communism itself, which is, in truth, the most reactionary model for political and social development that mankind has yet devised. And true to form, the Sandinistas have resorted to a psycholory of crisis, a psychology of ongoing revolution as the only plausible justification for continuing their disgusting regime.

Mr. Chairman, before I consider in detail how corrupt and disgusting the Sandinista regime has become—indeed, how truly reactionary the Sandinistas really are—I cannot avoid one final observation about the nature of these so-called revolutions. In the course of a congressional session, we debate American polity toward many countries. Whenever we discuss a country that has not yet had one of these grand and glorious leftwing revolutions, we do so in terms that suggest a sense of inevitability, a historical necessity for change that must inexorably come. But such is the romanticism—indeed, the fantasy—that surrounds a Communist revolutionary state like Nicaragua, that we frame our debate in terms that suggest an acceptance of the present tyranny in that country as a permanent fact of life.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is precisely the issue that is at stake in this debate. We need not accept the proposition that the hopes and dreams of the Nicaraguan people for a free and democratic society are lost forever. We need not accept the proposition that the corrupt and despotic criminals who masquerade as revolutionary leaders have succeeded in subverting irrevocable the very liberties that the revolution in 1979 was intended to establish.

There is an alternative to this nightmare in Nicaragua that alternative is to support the administration's request for the provision of military assistance to the democratic resistance forces fighting in Nicaragua. And I cannot draw the attention of Members to a more eloquent series of arguments in favor of this proposition than those that appeared in the March 24 edition of the New Republic. Entitled, "The Case of the Contras," this powerful editorial exposes the shallow reasoning and the hollow arguments used by those people who would deny American support for the resistance forces in Nicaragua.

As I begin to consider how the Sandinistas have betrayed their own revolution, let me quote from one portion of the editorial. It reads:

It is hard for Americans to believe that some people act out of ideological conviction. Look, therefore, at what the Sandinistas did long before there was a Reagan, long before there were Contras. In 1 year the Carter administration gave them in aid the equivalent of half of what Somoza received in 16 years, and during that time they systematically eliminated their democractic allies and aligned themselves with the Soviets.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLOMON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RITTER. If I could just for a moment get back to the colloquy that the gentleman from North Carolina and I were carrying on, the gentleman from North Carolina says we should tell the Soviets and the Cubans to back off. That is what I understand him to be saying.

Now, I may agree with that. But his colleagues are going into the well, and we have to, like, pull teeth to get them to admit that there is a Soviet threat, that there is a Communist threat.

The gentleman from North Carolina says: No more helicopter gunships.

Well, they may have as many as two fleets of MI-24 Hind-D's right now. With us pulling the rug out from under the opposition, there is no need for more helicopter gunships, there is no need for more MI-24's, there is no need for more MI-8's, they have got 150 tanks, they are loaded with 1.4 billion of Soviet arms right now, they do not need any more. Our people need more. Their glass is full, our glass is empty.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, let's listen now to the testimony of four Nicaraguans, who may all have come from different walks of life, but they are all alike in that they have seen their high hopes for their country destroyed by the very revolution that they all supported. These are authentic Nicaraguan voices. And I might add that each of these patriots has been in Washington in recent days lending their support to the administration's efforts to liberate their country.

First let's turn to Arturo Cruz. The first-high position he held in the Sandinista regime was as head of the Central Bank of Nicaragua. He then became a member of the Sandinista junta itself and eventually was appointed as Ambassador to the United States. He resigned from the regime in November 1981 when he simply couldn't support it any longer—he knew too much.

In an article he wrote in 1983 for the Foreign Affairs Journal, Mr. Cruz describes what he saw happening within the Sandinista regime during the years of 1980 and 1981 before there was even an armed resistance movement opposing the regime. He writes:

Dogmatism and adventurism seem to have wiped out the democratic and pluralistic ideals which, in 1979, united all Nicaraguan advocates of freedom. In April of 1980, after 9 months in government, I was confronted with a different decision. I had already become deeply disturbed by the indiscriminate and speedy radicalization of the revolution amid a great deal of confusion and sudden changes.

He goes on to lament that—

Totalitarian trends are gaining the upper hand in the process of defining Nicaragua's revolution. In the pursuit of a through emasculation of the "establishment," the radical zealots are prone to exhibit iconoclastic contempt for highly respected people and institutions.

I would again remind you that this statement was made in 1983, before that "iconoclastic contempt" he talks about, was directed at Pope John Paul on his visit to Nicaragua.

The personal history of Mr. Cruz since 1983 is, I believe, well know. He finally gave up all hope with the Sandinistas in 1984, when he saw what an absolute mockery they were making of the electoral process—rigging a false election in favor of Commandante Daniel Orteg's campaign for president. Today, Mr. Cruz is a part of the opposition forces our administration is trying to support.

The second witness I would call to your attention is named Aristides Sanchez Pavon. This gentleman's mother was Natalia Sandino Sanchez, the daughter of none other than Augusto Cesar Sandino himself, the Nicaraguan patriot whose good name has been cynically exploited by today's so-called revolutionaries. Despite being the grandson of the man who fought so valiantly for Nicaragua's independence earlier in this century, Mr. Pavon was imprisoned for 3 years after the Sandinistas took power in 1979.

Two weeks ago, here in Washington, Mr. Pavon charged that the Sandinistas have "committed treason against the ideals of Sandino * * * The Nicaraguan government is just a puppet of the Cuban Government." Mr. Pavon went on to say that his grandfather was against foreign influence in his country, adding "he would have been violently opposed to the Cuban and Soviet influnces in our country today."

As for his imprisonment, Mr. Pavon tells a harrowing tale of inhuman conditions even in what was described by the regime as a model prison. The killing of prisoners was wanton and indiscriminate, while others were left to die of starvation or dehydration. Even young children were arbitrarily detained in degraded conditions.

But, at least Mr. Pavon escaped with his life. His uncle, who was a nephew of Sandino's by marriage, wasn't so lucky. After his family's property was confiscated by the regime, he was murdered by the very people who invoke the name of his distinquished relative.

Mr. Pavon was able to escape from Nicaragua in 1982, and like so many other hunderds of Nicaraguans who have fled their homeland since 1979, he is trying to rebuild his life.

Now let's turn our attention to the testimony of Alvaro Jose Baldizon Aviles. Mr. Baldizon was a Nicaraguan police officer who participated in the revolution. After taking a 10-month criminology course in the Soviet Union, he was assigned to several posts in the Sandinista regime concerned with police investigations and economic reconstruction. He was personally selected by Tomas Borge in 1983 to chair the newly-established special investigations commission in the ministry of the Interior. This commission was set up for the express purpose of discrediting and deflecting criticisms being made by the Inter-American Human Rights Commission about human rights abuses by the Sandinistas. Mr. Baldizon chaired this commission for 2½ years until he was able to escape from Nicaragua in July of last year.

Before I summarize the charges that he has made about the Sandinistas, let me remind you that Mr. Baldizon was still a trusted official in an important position all during the time last year when we, here in Congress, were debating whether or not to aid the Nicaraguan opposition. Listen now to his compelling indictment against the Sandinistas:

The regime authorizes the assassination of political opponents. Mr. Baldizon estimates that about 700 people have been the victims of this practice.

Tomas Borge, the regime's Minister of the Interior, is personally and actively involved with the Colombian drug Mafia. Borge has been instrumental in providing plans, fuel, and landing rights to cocaine traffickers heading to the United States. The money made from this scheme is used to finance clandestine intelligence and security schemes throughout Central America.

The Nicaraguan permanent human rights commission was taken over by the regime in 1981. All of the commission's files were destroyed.

The Sandinistas have engaged in a systematic campaign to brutalize the Miskito Indians.

The regime is actively involved in the training of Costa Rican guerrillas who are trying to destabilize that democratic country.

The Sandinistas have taken a leaf from Adolph Hitler's book by using mob violence to break up the political meetings of those opposition groups that still have the courage to meet.

Many convicted criminals have been given positions in the regime. These people are primarily employed for use against the regime's political opponents. Illegal break ins and surveillance are commonplace. Thievery and drug abuse are rampant among the regime's employees.

The Sandinistas use elaborate propaganda charades to manipulate American visitors, particularly church groups. Borge, for example, greets visiting churchmen in an office festooned with liturgical symbols and religious art. Behind the backs of these visitors, Borge contemptuously refers to them as "useful fools and actually works in an office filled with pictures and books by Marx, Lenin, and all of his other Communist heroes."

Cubans occupy important operations positions throughout the Nicaraguan government, particularly in the Ministry of the Interior.

Such is the message that Mr. Baldizon brought with him when he fled his country last summer, having to leave his wife and children behind. As could be expected, the rest of his family has been subject to constant harassment and intimidation by the regime.

A fourth, and final, voice to which we should listen belongs to Jose Tomas Altamirano Rojas. A bus driver in Nicaragua, Mr. Altamirano also serves as an executive in an independent trade union. He is also a veteran of the Sandinista prison system, having recently spent 55 days in El Chipote, the regime's maximum security prison.

Mr. Altamirano wasn't given any food in the first 8 days of his captivity, days that were also spent undergoing a grueling interrogation. Throughout his imprisonment, he was kept confined in totally darkened cells where the air was stuffy and rancid. Once the guards began feeding him, Mr. Altamirano was given only three spoonsfuls of rice a day to eat. Sanitary facilities were minimal.

Thinking back on his ordeal, Mr. Altamirano remembers that El Chipote has long rows of cells, all underground. "One of the things that will always remain etched in my memory from that place are the cries of the women prisoners, calling out for their children and their families." He came to America to tell his story to those who would listen. He is soon to go back to Nicaragua, not knowing the fate that awaits him upon his arrival or the difficulties that may already have befallen his family.

I wish I could say, Mr. Chairman, that a story such as that told by Mr. Altamirano isn't typical, but I cannot. The Sandinista Regime, particularly the state secret police who are under the supervision of Tomas Borge, has established a prison system of unparalleled dimensions in this hemisphere, excluding, of course, Fidel Castro's own gulag. An estimate 13,000 to 15,000 Nicaraguans are presently being imprisoned, all for having run afoul of the regime and its arbitrary dictates. Truly it can be said that the Nicaraguans are told they are free, but they are everywhere in chains.

You know, the pattern repeats itself so many times that I wonder how anyone can possibly miss it. Everything the Sandinistas have done against the Miskito Indians—burning their villages, killing their tribal leaders, reeducating their children, and all the rest of it, fits into the classic Communist pattern of subjugating ethnic minorities, destroying their cultures and their means of independence and livelihood.

Now we know that the Miskitos are not alone, that 90,000 other Nicaraguans have been forcibly uprooted in the past several years. Living in squalid resettlement camps, 90,000 Nicaraguans are forced to eke out an existence for themselves, with the able bodied being compelled to work in the regime's collective farms. Nobody is allowed to leave, and the availability of food is tightly restricted. Sounds a little like Ethiopia, doesn't it? Then again, Ethiopia has also adopted the Cuban model for public administration and rural development.

Mr. Chairman, I need not belabor the point. The editorial in the New Republic that I mentioned a few minutes ago really sums up the situation for what it truly is. Here is the concluding paragraph of that editorial:

> We believe that preventing the establishment of a Leninist dictatorship in Nicaragua is a goal worthy of American support, and that those willing to fight for this cause are deserving of American assistance. A decision to support one side in a civil war is not one to be taken lightly. We come to it in full realization that, whatever tragedy it brings, the liquidation of the democratic side of the Nicaraguan civil war will bring infinitely more tragedy to Nicaragua, to Central America, and ultimately to the rest of the hemisphere.

Mr. Chairman, President Kennedy summoned us to join a long twilight struggle. If we cannot answer that call in our own hemisphere, what is to become of our country, a nation of global responsibilities as the leader of the free world? No one ever promised that the road would be easy or the cost would be light, but Americans have always taken that road and paid that cost. As those who are responsible for maintaining the lamp of freedom, we can do nothing less.

Let us support the President.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE].

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, in the past I have voted against military aid to the Contras. However, I have supported some nonmilitary aid to the Contras. I think the Sandanistas must somehow be pressured toward reform. The Contras have been applying some pressure.

But I cannot support this request for military assistance to the Contras.

The President has indicated that U.S. military aid to the Contras will decisively further our goal of halting the export of communism to other nations.

I find it curious that no other government in the region has requested U.S. aid to the Contras. No government in the region supports military aid to the Contras. Costa Rica is negotiating with the Sandanistas to end border clashes. The newly elected Government of Guatemala plans to host a summit of Central American leaders to discuss the situation in Nicaragua. The newly elected Government of Honduras has been hesitant in channeling aid to the Contras.

The Contadora nations do not appear to see the threat of communism in the same light that our President says is so apparent. None of these governments have supported military aid to the Contras. These are our friends, our fellow Americans: Mexico, Panama, Colombia, Venezuela. They are joined by Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, and Peru. The Contadora group now includes the majority of Latin American democracies. All of them caution us against military aid to the Contras. Why?

Now, I do believe that we have a national interest in the Central American issue. We cannot walk away. Limited support of the Contras is justified. That is not our choice tomorrow. No separate votes are allowed. In the final analysis we need negotiation. The Contadora group is expected to be a positive and forceful tool in demanding that the Sandanistas expel foreign military personnel.

I believe that we must encourage the Contadora group and other allied nations to demand the removal of foreign military personnel from Nicaragua, and to impress upon the Sanda-nistas the destabilizing impact of its so-called revolutionary goals.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is important that we look closely at what the President is asking of us.

The President says that we want to bring pressure on the Sandanistas to make democratic reforms. If this is the case, then the Contras are not the sole vehicle.

Over the past 5 years with millions of dollars in assistance, the Contras have made little substantial gains with Nicaragua. Why? The Contras have not siphoned popular support from the Sandanistas. The Contras have been ineffective in moving the Sandanistas toward democratic reforms. Why? How can more military aid be justified?

The President suggests that somehow, by funding the Contras movement, elimination of the Soviet threat to the region will be achieved.

We cannot be ambiguous with our goals. Is it democratic reforms or elimination of a potential threat?

If the removal of Soviet influence is our objective, then the President should be forthright with the American people and say this is our policy objective.

If we wish to use the Contras as our surrogates to eliminate the Communist threat in Nicaragua, then why should we assume they will be more effective now, when they have failed in the past?

Administration studies show that massive amounts of assistance and training over several years would be required to bring the Contras up to an effective fighting force. But where is the popular support?

In the face of an actual threat to U.S. national security, I would certainly support a strong, quick, and decisive response. If we are faced with a credible Soviet threat to United States security, then the President should ask Congress to address this issue.

I do not believe military aid alone to the Contras will realize our objectives. We must instead show that the rhetoric of the Sandinistas stands hollow in the face of our commitment to true democracy.

The United States cannot impose upon the Nicaraguan people what type of government they should have. The United States, however, must help protect the democracies of Central America from a Nicaragua which chooses to become a Soviet outpost in the Western Hemisphere. The United States can and should support regional efforts against foreign intervention in our hemisphere.

With constructive pressure from governments in the region the Sandinistas should be forced to negotiate in good faith, or reveal to us all their rejection of peace in the hemisphere.

If there is no progress and this threat is not contained, then I believe the United States should pursue other options.

Military action is always a choice—but it should be the final option. The alternative is not escalation, but rather negotiation. The administration has not yet proven the alternatives in Central America have been exhausted. The present administration policy is not acceptable, Mr. Chairman, and I cannot support it.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 seconds to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would just suggest to my good friend, the gentleman from Texas, that if you asked the people in the Middle East if they support our program for aiding Israel, you would not find many people shaking their heads in the affirmative. But it is right that we do it. We do not count noses in the U.N. to determine what our foreign policy will be. We determine what is in the best interests of our people, and we do it.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. KENNELLY].

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the request for aid to the Contras now before us.

The United States has been providing aid to the Contras—overtly or covertly—for nearly 5 years. Here in the Congress, we have spent countless hours debating the merits of such proposals. We have sent millions of taxpayer dollars to the Contras. And what did we get for all that time and all that money?

Five years later, the Sandinistas are still firmly ensconced in Managua. The Contras control less territory now than they did 2 years ago. The leaders of the Contadora nations are still pleading with the United States to pursue political and diplomatic solutions in the area. And the people of Nicaragua are worse off than when this aid began.

Now, the administration tells us that just doing more of what we have been doing will turn the tide. Mr. Chairman, very frankly, I do not believe it.

I do not believe that $100 million will turn a ragtag guerrilla army into a fighting machine that can oust the Sandinistas.

I do not believe that $100 million can buy the support of the Nicaraguan people who are convinced that the Contras are standins for the Somocistas.

I do not believe that $100 million can turn the Marxist regime of Daniel Ortega into a democratic state that we will be proud to have in our hemisphere.

I do not believe that $100 million in aid to the Contras will turn the Nicaraguan Government away from its dependence on Cuba and the Soviet Union.

I do not believe that $100 million can divert the Nicaraguan people from more fundamental concerns like food and peace.

I do not believe that $100 million can—in the words of Cap Weinberger—"do the job," because, frankly, I'm not sure of what the job is supposed to be.

The administration's explanation of our goals in Nicaragua has changed constantly. First, we were trying to interdict arms shipments to El Salvador. Then we were forcing the Sandinistas to hold elections. Then it was to give the Contras a bargaining chip with the Sandinistas. Now it is to force the Sandinistas to negotiate with the Contras. This is the one-size-fits-all approach to foreign policy. No matter how the rationale shifts, the remedy remains the same: give aid to the Contras.

This aid request was opposed by eight Latin American foreign ministers in a visit to Washington last month. These leaders know that a military solution is not feasible—not without a massive commitment of U.S. money, arms, and troops. They are unanimously behind a negotiated settlement. They, who know the region first hand, and whose security interests are even more at stake than ours, support the Contadora process and want us to do the same. Little more than a week ago, Colombian President Belisario Betancur said: "I think that an initiative such as the request for $100 million taken by President Reagan is wrong. I know we can get more through negotiation."

I know we can too. Because what we will get from granting this aid is greater U.S. involvement in a conflict that is unnecessary, unwise, and not in our own security interests.

Mr. Chairman, it is one thing to pursue a policy knowing it may not work. Those of us in this body face that every day. We understand that sometimes, you can't have all the answers, and you have to take a chance.

But it is another to pursue a policy knowing it will not work; knowing, even before you begin, that failure is inevitable. That is the case with this latest request for aid to the Contras. It hasn't worked for the last 5 years, and it will not work now. At best, and I mean at best, it will cost us $100 million. At worst, it will draw us into war.

I urge my colleagues to vote against this request for aid to the Contras.

□ 1625

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. KENNELLY] has expired.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 additional seconds to the gentlewoman.

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. KENNELLY. I yield.

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlewoman is aware of the fact, this Congress is not providing and has not been providing any military aid. The gentlewoman's statement was that the Contras are not doing any good. Is the gentlewoman aware that we are not giving them any military aid now? That is why we are not doing it. Does the gentlewoman want to continue that policy of doing nothing?

Mrs. KENNELLY. Unfortunately, the policy has been to follow that we are getting private funds to give military aid and the encouragement by the administration to follow the policy that he has is resulting in activity that now we have to shore up with increased funding.

Mr. DEWINE. What is the gentlewoman's policy?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman has expired.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I proudly yield 4 minutes to one of our Members who has voted on the other side of this and has studied it very hard for a year, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RINALDO].

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, in recent weeks I have discussed in detail the Contra aid proposal with President Reagan and others in favor of and opposed to the aid package. After careful consideration of their arguments, I believe we should approve this aid package.

I reached this decision based on a number of disturbing trends I see continuing in Nicaragua.

The Armed Forces of Nicaragua are now, with the exception of Mexico, the largest in Central America. The Soviet Union has provided them with more than half a billion dollars in military aid since 1981. This equipment, coupled with the presence of 200 Soviet advisers, 7,500 Cubans, and military advisers from Eastern bloc countries, leaves little doubt in my mind of the intentions of the Sandinistas.

The strategic interests of the United States are threatened. The largest airport south of the Rio Grande is now under construction in Nicaragua and could serve as a base for Soviet warplanes. In addition, port development for future use by the Soviet Navy is a direct threat to the Panama Canal and our Caribbean shipping lanes. These lanes are a vital link in our mobilization plans to provide assistance to our allies in Europe and the Mideast.

The Sandinistas are harboring terrorists from around the world. Intelligence reports indicate that representatives of the PLO, the Red Brigade, Iran, Libya, and Syria are serving in a training capacity at terrorist camps to prepare for future acts, most likely against North America.

They have greatly restricted the activities of the Catholic Church and have tried to impose their own people's church in its place. Fortunately, of the 912 bishops, priests, and nuns in Nicaragua, only 52 have alined themselves with this liberation church, and of that number only 10 are even Nicaraguan. In addition, the Jewish community of Nicaragua has been virtually driven into exile and the synagog in Managua has been closed and desecreted.

The Sandinistas have revoked civil liberties and denied the right to speak, publish, assemble or worship without sanctions or harassment. The only remaining independent newspaper has been shut down and the labor movement denied the right to strike.

The Sandinistas themselves have stated that their's is a "revolution without borders." Should they succeed in toppling the Governments of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras, and Mexico, the United States would undoubtedly experience an immigration problem unparalled in our history.

As this military buildup and the repression continues, the Sandinistas have refused to negotiate with the Contras and have no interest in a coalition government. Their sole aim is to consolidate power and eliminate all opposition.

While some say it is too late to change course, I do not agree. Despite the oppression of their own government, the people of Nicaragua have not lost their vigilant desire to once again recapture their betrayed revolution. I have been and remain a supporter of the Contadora peace process and am hopeful that a negotiated settlement can be reached.

However, now is not the time to turn our backs on the freedom fighters. This vote must reflect our commitment to restrict Soviet expansionism and restore peace throughout Central America.

This is not Vietnam. We must keep it at peace. We must support democracy in this hemisphere. I urge you to join me in voting for aid to the Contras.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend, the gentleman from New Jersey, just paraphrased the speech that the President gave on Sunday evening. I must say that it must be frustrating for the President, after pulling out all the stops, to have a scientific poll indicate that the American people just were not buying. By a poll of 54 to 30, the American people after the speech expressed their opposition to this awful, reckless adventure in which the President wants to engage us in Central America.

Of course, if the President really had a case for Contra aid, he would not need to invent so many facts to support it. Look at the headlines in this morning's New York Times:

"Drug Agency Rebuts Reagan's Charge."

"Rabbi Disputes Reagan Point About the Jews in Nicaragua."

"Brazil Surprised To Be on Reagan's List."

But these distortions and misstatements should not surprise any of us who were the recipients of the suggestion last year by the President that the Pope supported the President's position in Nicaragua.

There is a strange thing that happens in this body and in the other body at times. The American people are able to maintain their sense of appropriateness and propriety, but we, their elected Representatives, from time to time lose our heads and our sense. That is what happened in Vietnam. We started off in Vietnam providing arms assistance and then next we had trainers and then we had advisers and battlefield assistants and the next thing we had was 50,000 young Americans, the brothers and the fathers and the sons of the American people, who lay dead in that awful adventure, which we now dismiss with a wave of the hand and say, "Oh, Nicaragua is not Vietnam."

It is indeed Vietnam all over again. The President talks about the credibility that the U.S. Government will lose if we do not continue our support of the Contras. Well, look at where that logic takes us. You give them $100 million this year and there are at best by the President's own estimate 20,000 Contras.

The President says that there are 60,000 Sandinista military forces and 50,000 national militiamen. Well, how are those 20,000 going to beat the 60,000 and the additional 50,000? They cannot.

So if it costs us our credibility, with the Soviet Union and the rest of the world, not to give the $100 million now or if the Contras cannot win with the $100 million, then what next? $200 million? $500 million? And if they still cannot win at that point, what is the next step?

If credibility, the credibility of the U.S. Government is the issue, then the next step is American military personnel, American young men fighting and dying in Nicaragua. That is what this issue is all about, and the American people see it quite clearly. That is why overwhelmingly since 1981 when the President has tried to get us engaged militarily in Nicaragua, the American people have said "no."

President Reagan says "every American parent will be outraged to learn that top Nicaraguan officials are deeply involved in drug trafficking." But his own Drug Enforcement Administration says that doesn't correspond with anything it knows. According to the most recent DEA estimates, 75 percent of the cocaine in the United States comes from Colombia, 15 percent from Bolivia, 5 percent from Peru, and the other 5 percent from Ecuador, Argentina, Brazil, and Chile. When it comes to drugs, Nicaragua should be the least of an American parent's worries.

President Reagan says the Contra leaders are the equivalent of Jefferson and Madison and Washington. The fact is that 12 out of the 13 members of the FDN high command used to serve Somoza in his National Guard, and their record of torture and murder of campesinos and doctors and teachers is well documented. Ask Chris Dickey of the Washington Post, who observed the Contras first hand over a period of months. Ask Edgar Chamorro, who worked directly with the Contra leadership. Ask Salvador Icaza, who used to be an aide to FDN leader Enrique Bermudez. Ask Amnesty International, Americas Watch, the Washington Office on Latin America, the New York Times, CBS News—all of them have confirmed the dismal record of Contra atrocities.

Are all of these sources really part of a Communist disinformation campaign? In the face of this overwhelming record, the President says that atrocities attributed to the Contras were really committed by Sandinistas dressed as "freedom fighters." And the source of this allegation is a man who has changed his story so often, that, according to Americas Watch, he has lost "the last vestige of credibility." Our policy should be based on the facts, not on our President's favored choice of fantasies.

There are human rights problems in Nicaragua, and some of them are attributable to the Government. The opposition press, though it continues to publish, is censored. On and off since 1982, some constitutional rights have been suspended. That is cause for concern.

But it is not unique in the region. Look at El Salvador, which President Reagan holds up as a model of democracy. The insurgency there is one-fourth the size of the one in Nicaragua in relation to population, but the Government there has been operating under a state of siege since August 21, 1980. Constitutional rights are suspended in El Salvador, too. El Salvador, unlike Nicaragua, doesn't even have an opposition newspaper. The last remaining one, El Independiente, was raided and shut down by police in January 1981, after "numerous bombings, threats, military interventions, and assaults on employees." And a pattern of killings and disappearances by government forces continues. (Source: ACLU, Americas Watch.)

The administration presents a systematically distorted picture of the diplomatic situation in Central America. According to the administration, Nicaragua is subverting the Contadora process, and Nicaragua won't accept verifiable agreements. Indeed, according to the administration, a major reason why Contra aid is necessary is "to bring the Sandinistas to the bargaining table."

The fact is that Nicaragua is at the bargaining table. Nicaragua and Costa Rica have recently reached an agreement under Contadora to demilitarize their common border. They have agreed that Contadora countries will provide verification. Meanwhile, the administration refuses to talk to Nicaragua despite a call for talks by the Contadora countries.

The administration refuses the Contadora countries' call to negotiate, and dismisses the Contadora foreign ministers' plea to stop militarizing the region, and still wants to claim it supports Contadora. It can't have it both ways.

We are steadily marching toward direct military involvement in Nicaragua, and President Reagan would have us believe that the countries of Latin America are quietly cheering him on. But listen to what the President of Peru said last week:

> An act of hostility and intervention in Nicaragua will be an act of hostility and intervention against all of Latin America. I announce from this sovereign Congress the Peruvian government decision that if foreign forces invade Nicaragua, Peru will break relations with the aggressive power and make every effort to defend the brother country.

This policy will lead us to a regional war, the like of which we have never seen in our history.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] who has worked so hard in this Congress on human rights in all corners of this world.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS] is quoted in the April 23, 1985, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as saying:

> If you are a citizen of El Salvador, you have nowhere near the capacity to openly criticize your government as you do if you are a citizen of Nicaragua.

If the gentleman believes that, I ask that the gravity of his remarks be taken in the light of his judgment on freedom in Nicaragua.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have the time.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York may have forgotten that whatever existed——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] has the time.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, first let me say that the only reason we are debating this administration's aid package to the Contras on the House floor today is because of betrayal.

It is clear, even to the staunchest opponents of the Reagan request, that the Nicaraguan Government has betrayed its own people. It has betrayed the very principles it articulated during the revolution. The Communists in Nicaragua have reneged on solemn promises made to the Organization of American States, the United Nations, the United States, and above all, to their own people to provide for fundamental freedoms and guarantees of basic human rights.

Rather than honoring their commitment to political pluralism, authentic elections, an independent judiciary, and a free press; rather than creating a democratic Nicaragua as promised, the Sandinistas have systematically constructed a violent Communist dictatorship. Communist Nicaragua is today a bastion of internal repression, egregious human rights violations, and external subversion. The record of Communist Nicaragua is shameful—it is a record that I trust no one in today's debate will defend.

Mr. Chairman, it is time that we fully recognized the ugly repressive character of Communist Nicaragua. Estimates of political prisoners vary from 4,000 to as many as 20,000 at any given time, according to the Independent Permanent Human Rights Commission [CPDH], and prisoners are often severely tortured. Cruel, inhumane, and degrading treatment of prisoners is pervasive and a detainee can be investigated indefinitely, tortured, or submitted to cruel treatment without any legal mechanisms available to stop the abuses.

There are hundreds of examples to illustrate the point. To cite one example, according to the State Department's "1985 Country Reports on Human Rights":

> In 1984 and early 1985, several women detainees in "El Chipote" reported they had been raped repeatedly by their guards, one woman after she had been drugged for an interrogation session. Women prisoners, without regard to age, have been forced to assume humiliating positions naked in front of male guards who insult and hit or kick them, in some cases only because their husbands or sons are accused of crimes against the state.
> President Daniel Ortega himself, before international journalists during a televised press conference, admitted to and justified the detention at "El Chipote" of the president of a Catholic school parents' association. Commander Lenin Cerna, head of State Security forces, personally tortured the victim. The 60-year-old, who was not politically active, was detained because of his religiously-based criticisms of the government-enforced program of Marxist-Leninist patriotic education. Cerna and his agents reportedly beat the victim and Cerna himself put a pistol to the victim's head, saying he was going to kill him that night and the rest of his family later.

When I was in Nicaragua in 1984 I met with archbishop, now Cardinal, Obando y Bravo. He told our delegation of the persecution being inflicted upon the church and of other human rights violations. We met with Father Bismarck Carballo, the spokesman for the Curia and the director of the church radio station. He told us how the Sandinista Communists sought to discredit him in a phony sex scandal. In 1982, Maritza Castillo told Father Carballo she had attempted suicide, was despondent, and desperately needed couseling. She urged him to come to her home. Shortly after Father Carballo arrived at her home, a Government agent burst in, beat Father Carballo and forced him at gunpoint to disrobe. Police then ushered Father Carballo out the door where a state sponsored TV crew, and other media, just happened to be waiting.

Collaborating details of this and other setups have been provided by Alvaro Baldizon, former chief inspector of the Special Investigations Commission of the Nicaraguan Ministry of the Interior. As a matter of fact, Mr. Baldizon says that Tomas Borge himself helped devise the plan to discredit Father Carballo.

Mr. Baldizon who defected Communist Nicaragua on July 1, 1985 at great risk to his wife and child who still live there, says that 90 percent of the human rights abuses alleged by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights by Sandinista government officials are true. He has estimated that for every alleged Contra abuse there are 10 committed by the Government and significantly his findings suggest that the Contras do not have a policy for committing abuses while the Sandinistas have such a policy. As a matter of fact, the Contras have a code of conduct to which their soldiers must adhere. Offenders are tried before a court and sentenced if found guilty.

Finally, Mr. Baldizon's testimony further documents the use of torture, international drug trafficking by the Government, training of foreign guerrillas for subversion, church persecution, and political assassination. He also has described how adroitly the Sandinistas deceive visiting international delegations and how the Government uses them to further its international political strategies.

Mr. Chairman, I would remind Members that the United States and our friends in Central America were instrumental in ousting the Somoza regime. On June 23, 1979, the Organization of American States with strong U.S. concurrence passed a resolution that effectively led to Somoza's demise. Specifically, the resolution called:

One, for the immediate and definitive replacement of the Somoza regime.

Two, installation in Nicaragua of democratic government, the composition of which should include the principal representative groups which oppose the Somoza regime and which reflects the free will of the people of Nicaragua.

Three, guarantee of the respect for human rights of all Nicaraguans without exception.

Four, the holding of free elections as soon as possible, that lead to the establishment of a truly democratic government that guarantees peace, freedom, and justice.

The only aspect of this resolution to which the Sandinistas gave their total commitment was the replacement of the Somoza regime.

Today, Communist Nicaragua has by far the largest standing military force in the region and includes at least 60,000 active duty troops and another 60,000 reserves. Communist Nicaragua is armed to the teeth with an offensive capability and its arsenal includes 150 tanks, 200 armored personnel carriers, 44 helicopters, 300 missile launchers, and a large assortment of artillery pieces. Today the country is home to approximately 200 Soviet advisers, 7,500 Cubans, and personnel from East Germany, Bulgaria, Lybia, and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

As Secretary of State George Shultz said in a speech on March 3, "Nicaragua's military machine has no parallel in the history of Central America." Communist Nicaragua is a menace to its neighbors and the threat cannot be wished away.

It seems clear, Mr. Chairman, that Nicaragua is serious about exporting revolution to its neighbors. Bayardo Arce, a high-ranking official Sandinista Communist said in May of 1984, "We cannot cease being internationalist unless we cease being revolutionaries."

Back in August of 1981, Sandinista Minister of Defense Humberto Ortega said, "Marxist Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution."

Interior Minister Tomas Borge, with whom I had a 2-hour talk in Managua a few years ago, said in 1981, "This revolution goes beyond our borders. Our revolution was always international."

The evidence is compelling, Mr. Chairman, that Nicaragua has been equipping, training organizations, and infiltrating Communist guerrillas into Honduras and El Salvador. They have targeted militarily weak Costa Rica for subversive activities. They are even involved in Colombia. Many of the arms used by terrorists to attack the National Palace of Justice in Bogota have been traced to Nicaragua. True to their word in this instance, Nicaragua is exporting revolution, violence, and death.

Last November President Jose Napoleon Duarte of El Salvador was quoted in the New York Times as saying (November 1, 1985, page 3):

In Central America, in my own country, countless persons from all walks of life and, in the case of my family, my daughter, Ines Guadalupe, would not have been victims of the terrorists if the terrorists did not have the support, direction, approval and timely protection of the terrorist dictatorship in Nicaragua.

Members will recall that the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985, Congress included an important finding of the fact that:

The . . . government of Nicaragua . . . has flagrantly violated . . . the security of the nations in the region, in that it has committed and refused to cease aggression in the form of armed subversion against its neighbors in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, the Charter of the Organization of American States. . . .

The National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, often referred to as the Kissinger Commission, also concluded that the Nicaraguan threat to its neighbors was compelling. The Kissinger Commission also offered a forecast of what would happen if Nicaragua succeeded in exporting its Communist revolution. To quote from page 93:

As Nicaragua is already doing, additional Marxist/Leninist regimes in Central America could be expected to expand their armed forces, bring in large numbers of Cuban and other Soviet bloc advisors, develop sophisticated agencies of internal repression and external subversion, and sharpen polarizations, both within individual countries and regionally . . . this would almost surely produce refugees, perhaps millions of them, many of whom would seek entry into the United States. . . . The United States cannot isolate itself from the regional turmoil. The crisis is on our doorstep.

Mr. Chairman, Nicaragua's neighbors are justifiably scared. A scientific survey conducted by an affiliate of the Gallup poll between June and November 1985 in several Central American countries found that Nicaragua was named as the country posing the greatest military threat to their own security. That was the view of 87 percent in Costa Rica and 79 percent in Honduras. Significantly, three-fourths of those interviewed in Costa Rica favor United States aid to the Contras while that policy is supported by a 2-to-1 margin in the other Central American countries including El Salvador.

I am pleased that the Contras, now an estimated 20,000 strong are more united now under an umbrella organization called the United Nicaraguan Opposition [UNO]. On January 22, 1986, UNO issued a statement of principles which expressed UNO's commitment to peace, democracy, respect for human rights, and the promotion of social justice. UNO is led by three former Somoza opponents Arturo Cruz, Adolfo Calero, and Alfonso Robelo.

Arturo Cruz was twice jailed by the Somoza regime. He served for a time as head of the central bank under the Sandinistas, then as a member of the ruling junta, and finally as their ambassador to the United States. He resigned in protest against the Communist policies of the Sandinistas. He was the democratic opposition's Presidential candidate in 1984 but refused to participate when the Government would not permit him freedom of speech, press, and assembly.

Adolfo Calero serves as commander in chief of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force [FDN]. After the fall of Somoza he attempted to work with the Sandinistas in rebuilding Nicaragua. He became disillusioned by their Communist vision for Nicaragua in 1982.

Alfonso Robelo is the leader of the Democratic Revolutionary Alliance [ARDE] and was a leading critic of Somoza. After the revolution in July 1979, he was one of the five original members of the junta. In 1980, he resigned in protest.

I would just say parenthetically that the former president of the Nicaraguan Red Cross, Ismael Reyes has been named the head of the UNO—or Contra—Human Rights Commission.

Mr. Chairman, I support meaningful negotiation between the Communists in Nicaragua and the Contras, the OAS and the United States. I think it is unfair and simply untrue to suggest that the President isn't committed to a negotiated settlement. Three special Presidential envoys—Senator Stone, Ambassadors Schlaudeman and Habib—have made 49 trips to the region since 1983. The United States has met in high-level, bilateral talks with the Sandinista Communists nine times since June of 1984. Secretary of State George Shultz has personally gone to Managua to seek peace. Yet the record shows that it was Nicaragua who ended participation in the Contadora talks in the fall of 1985.

It was Nicaragua again on December 9, 1985, who alone voted against an Organization of American States' resolution calling for accelerated negotiations. With a vote of 28 to 1, Nicaragua was the only member to vote against the resolution. This isn't really surprising. When I spoke with Nicaragua's dictator, Daniel Ortega, in Managua in the spring of 1984 his government then had little use for the Contadora peace negotiations.

On February 6 of this year the opposition political parties proposed suspension of hostilities, a general amnesty, repeal of martial law, and agreement for honest elections. The Sandinista Communists rejected their proposal.

But we can't just give up, we must continue to hope, we must continue to seek peace for the region.

I agree with the assessment of our distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Democrat DANTE FASCELL of Florida who eloquently argued in committee 2 weeks ago that aid to the Contras will provide the only real incentive to the Nicaraguan Communists to negotiate seriously.

I would remind Members that since June of 1984, the Congress has proscribed all military aid to the Contras. The only aid they have received from our country was a small donation of humanitarian assistance. Nicaragua's response to congressional termination of military assistance should be sobering to all. Since June of 1984, the Communists have further trashed and violated the human rights of the citizenry, they have stepped up the use of torture and persecution of the Catholic Church and other denominations. They have responded by derailing internal and international negotiations and by procuring an additional $350 million in sophisticated military hardware from the Soviet Union.

Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come to approach the issue with more realism. If we refuse to face the truth concerning Managua's intentions and goals, there is a real chance that Central America will incrementally grow Communist—the lives and futures of millions will be imperiled—while we cling to well-meaning but misguided straws of hope.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DAUB].

Mr. DAUB. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the President and the resolution before the House.

Both sides on the question of assistance to the Contras agree on the nature of the regime. Senior Senator SASSER of Tennessee, speaking for Democratic opponents of assistance said: "We agree that the Sandinista government has betrayed the promise of its revolution, has suppressed the freedom of its own people, and has supported subversion in El Salvador * * * our dissagreement is with the means the President has used to achieve these goals." In effect, they agree on the ends of the President's policy: Containment of Marxist-Leninism in Central America.

They say let's use diplomacy and positive reinforcement. We have and will continue to do so. The record is replete with efforts of the United States to negotiate meaningful agreements on nonintervention of Nicaragua in its neighbor's affairs. Three special Presidential envoys have made over 49 trips to the region since 1983. High level bilateral talks have been arranged on 10 separate occasions. The United States gave more assistance to the Sandinistas in the first 18 months of its existence than we provided to Somoza for the previous 20 years. The Sandinistas' response to these overtures? They have stonewalled.

If its just a disagreement on means, not ends, why not give the President the benefit of the doubt? He was right on El Salvador. We went through the exact same debate then with opponents saying there is no hope for political reform of the government and the guerrillas have too much popular support. Well, Reagan won, and so did the people of El Salvador.

If the House debated Grenada before the operation, opponents of Contra assistance would have fought it tooth and nail. We may not have had the operation, and the people of Grenada's neighbors quaked in the wake of Grenada expansion.

Senior Senator SASSER from Tennessee, also said, "We agree that Nicaragua must never become a base for Soviet military adventurism in this hemisphere" the President's judgment is that Nicaragua is already a Soviet base. The Senator admits that Nicaragua is subverting its neighbor El Salvador. He would also agree that Nicaragua has Bulgarians, East Germans, Soviets, Cubans, Libyans, North Koreans and PLO personnel and has received substantial arms from these people. If this isn't Soviet military adventurism, I'd ask the Senator what is?

Even assuming reasonable people can disagree about whether Nicaragua is a Soviet puppet, the wide latitude the Constitution affords the President in the conduct of foreign affairs argues strongly for giving the Commander in Chief the benefit of the doubt.

One principal product of Marxist-Leninist regimes is refugees. If the economic productivity of these regimes was as high as their refugee productivity, we might not be here today. But the fact is millions have fled from under their boot in Eastern Europe, Afghanistan, Indochina, Ethopia, and Cuba.

We already have a big enough illegal immigration problem on our Southern border. If Nicaragua isn't checked, this Marxist-Leninist regime on our doorstep will soon begin turning out refugees as efficiently as any of its other fraternal allies around the world.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY].

Mr. DYMALLY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, in the past couple of weeks we have been subjected to the most far-fetched rhetoric I think I have heard in my whole career in elected office. Despite the rhetoric, I know of few people who believe the Sandinista invasion of Texas is going to occur in their lifetime. I know of few people who believe that $100 million from the United States is going to achieve the overthrow of the Sandinista government by the various opposition groups. Not even many supporters of Contra aid believe it is going to achieve any successful result. The President is asking us to make an expensive gesture. There are a few gestures I think we could make at home with $100 million, and they would at least have the advantage of being positive gestures.

What is that $100 million going to buy for the Contras? It will ensure that a few more battles will be fought. It will ensure that some Sandinistas will be killed and that some Contras will be killed. Maybe a helicopter or two will be destroyed. If previous experience is any guide, a number of civilians who want nothing more than to be left alone will be killed by one side or the other. Nothing more. Just a gesture.

This Contra aid request is an unproductive waste. If we really want a Nicaragua that is not controlled by Russia, then there are better, more humane ways to accomplish that end. Rather than giving the Nicaraguan people the impression that the United States is in the business of promoting war and killing and suffering in their country, let's show them the United States at its best. Let's send in the Peace Corps to help school the nation's children. Let's send in doctors to improve the health of the people. Let's develop a thriving trade with Nicaragua. Let's engage the leaders of that country in peaceful negotiation. They have said they will cooperate in the Contadora process. Let's allow them to make good on their statements.

While some would argue that Cuba is Communist today because the Bay of Pigs invasion failed, it is at least as reasonable to contend that Cuba is Communist today because the United States turned a cold shoulder to Castro when he came here looking for help shortly after the revolution. Khrushchev also was visiting the United States at the time, and received Castro with open arms. None of us wants Nicaragua to be a second Cuba. Let's take the first step toward seeing that it will not become so. Let's turn down the President's request for Contra aid.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL].

Mr. RANGEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, this morning when I was congratulating the President, who was speaking out against drug trafficking, which is certainly unique for this administration, to identify countries who are violating international law, I wanted to point out that the Drug Enforcement Administration has rebutted the charges.

We have some pretty pictures here that my colleague from California has presented to the House. I want to point out that the individual who is supposed to be transferring that cocaine is supposed to have been an aide to a Nicaraguan Interior Minister. It is supposed to be in 1984. DEA says that is the only isolated information that they have; that they have reassessed the intelligence on the subject and that is all that they can say.

They also point out that they have no information implicating the Minister of the Interior or other Nicaraguan officials.

I am convinced that most of this is a political campaign. I get most of my impressions from the commercials that are being run by some political party, but I would like to point out that the testimony of Assistant Secretary John R. Thomas, given to the Task Force on International Narcotic Control of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on March 11, 1986, supports the Drug Enforcement Administration, to wit: A low-type aide, using DEA terms, to the Nicaraguan Interior Minister was indicted in Florida for being involved in cocaine. My God, if we were able to spend that $100 million on our Mexican-United States border, I am certain we would focus more attention on this problem than we are with this.

But Assistant Secretary Thomas points out that the political situation has eliminated bilateral cooperation on narcotics control and makes it impossible to gather accurate information on a continuing basis.

So I think there is enough for us to have political debate on, but this should not be a subject that should turn a vote.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHEUER].

Mr. SCHEUER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, during the prolonged and often acrimonious public debate over military aid to the Contras, we have heard a level of rhetoric that has strained our credulity. As Haynes Johnson wrote in this morning's Washington Post:

> Until President Reagan's address Sunday night about the menace from Managua, Richard Nixon held the presidential record for overstating a case.

We have heard President Reagan tell us on network television that the Sandinista government not only threatens the security of the United States, but also poses a mortal threat to the entire New World. This tiny little country, hardly the size of Queens from whence I come threatens our security? His words defy reality when one considers the simple fact that not a single one of the democratic nations of Latin America have asked us to provide military aid to the Contras.

To draw a parallel, at the time our country engaged in the liberation mission in Grenada in 1983, a number of chiefs of state and a number of high cabinet ministers from other Caribbean nations got together, conferred, and called President Reagan. They told him that there was an urgent and desperate need for U.S. military intervention to prevent that island from becoming an absolutely impregnable Communist garrison. Our country responded to that need.

Nothing remotely like that occurred in this instance. We have heard nothing like that unanimity in support of our intervention in Grenada. In point of fact, we have heard exactly the contrary from Latin American leaders. We have heard unanimity that we should stay out; that we should mind our P's and Q's; that the most constructive thing we can do is support the Contadora process.

I am chairman of a global committee of parliamentarians on population and development. We have hundreds of members across the world and over 100 members in Latin America. I have heard from dozens of them urging the United States to stay out, leave us alone, help the peace process. They want us to provide some aid to help people; not to kill people.

The unanimity there is for us to help the Contadora nations and promote negotiations. There is total unanimity among Nicaragua's neighbors in asking us not to interfere, not to finance more bloodletting, and not to provide guns to blow up a few bridges or assassinate God knows how many hundreds of people. There is no chance whatsoever of helping the Contras really gain a claim on the hearts and minds of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the level of debate here in the House today will rise above the erroneous and fiery rhetoric we have heard so far.

I don't like the Sandinista government any more than Ronald Reagan does.

But I don't believe that $100 million in military aid to the Contras is going to do anything but make the situation worse in Nicaragua.

Instead of encouraging the Sandinistas to negotiate, $100 million in military aid will push them further into a corner, giving them even less in- centive to make concessions and providing them with further excuses to increase internal repression.

It is true that the Sandinistas have violated human rights and conducted brutal assaults on the Nicaraguan people.

But the Contras—whose leaders include officers of the brutal Somoza regime—frequently practice terror tactics such as murder, torture, and rape, in the name of democracy.

Such tactics have been documented repeatedly by a number of observers, including Catholic priests and nuns.

Over the last 5 years, our Nation has funneled more than $250 million to the Contras—money that has furthered atrocities against the Nicaraguan people and failed to help the Contras win even a single victory against the Nicaraguan regime.

We are faced with a delicate diplomatic problem in Nicaragua that would be handled better by United States-backed negotiations than United States-backed insurgents who don't even have the support of the Nicaraguan people.

I agree with the goals of the President, but I can't support his methods.

No one wants to see Soviet-Cuban bases in Nicaragua and I think the leaders of both nations know what will happen if they attempt to make such a move.

The leaders of the democratic countries of Central America, the Catholic bishops, and a majority of the American people all are telling Congress to stop this plan to increase the bloodshed in Nicaragua.

Negotiations are the key to a peaceful settlement in Nicaragua, yet the administration repeatedly has ignored that route, breaking off the only negotiations with the Sandinistas in January 1985.

Every Member in this House wants peace and freedom in Nicaragua.

Every Member wants to halt the spread of Communism in Central America.

But let's take constructive and meaningful action to achieve these goals.

No one wants another Vietnam war, but that's the road we will be heading down if we approve this request for military aid.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER].

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Reagan administration's request for an additional $100 million in aid for the Nicaraguan Contra rebels. The President and his senior advisers present this request as an "either/or" proposition: either you're with the President or you're for the Communists.

The tone of the President's televised remarks on Sunday night was an affront to both Democrats and Republicans who oppose this aid. Some of us feel their are alternative ways to achieve peace in the region; this does not mean we want a Marxist-Leninist foothold in Central America. The scare tactics would be more effective if the allegations were true: where are the millions of Nicaraguan refugees streaming across our border? Then there is the litany of Sandinista labels: exporters of revolution, terrorists, anti-Semites and now drug traffickers. What will they be next month?

I seriously doubt that any of my colleagues have illusion about the nature of the Sandinista regime, that a Marxist government is in place there whose policies are contrary to our values and beliefs. The focus should be on whether we support a military or peaceful process to reach that goal. Despite the administration's rhetorical support of a negotiated settlement. It appears their policies are intended to undermine, if not overthrow, the Government of Nicaragua.

Administration spokespersons have remarked that the views of the American public should not be given great weight in the formulation of foreign policy because the average American is interested in sports, not politics. If there is one lesson we should have learned by now it is that the absence of broad public support dooms a foreign policy course to failure. The President should heed this warning for his present policy toward Nicaragua.

A majority of the American public fails to see the "unusual and extraordinary threat" this impoverished nation poses to our national security. They have not seen results from the aid we have been providing overtly and covertly to the Contras for the last 4 years. There are no concrete examples of the administration pledge to pursue negotiation as an alternative policy. They definitely don't see any similarity between the Contras and our Nation's Founding Fathers, particularly in the area of human rights.

What the American people do fear is the administration's request for a blank check of $100 million—an amount nearly equal to all the aid we offer to the struggling and debt-burden domocracies of Latin America. They see a policy that has pushed the Sandinistas further away from the negotiating table and into the willing embrace of the Soviets. They see a policy that will soon offer us a Lebanese dilemma: abandoning the Contras or sending our Armed Forces into direct combat there. Fortunately, the majority of Americans are not fooled by the administration's duplicitous policy, nor are they persuaded that a negotiated settlement can be achieved through violent means.

More military aid to the Contras will not bring peace to the region. Not only do the CIA and other key segments of our intelligence community acknowledge that the Contras are incapable of defeating the Nicaraguan Armed Forces, but they admit that the military equipment acquired by Managua has been defensive in nature in order to respond to the arming of the Contras by the U.S. taxpayer. The Contras have yet to capture and hold a single town, and they have proven inadequate to the task of stemming the alleged massive arms flows from Nicaragua to its neighbors.

As the former chairman of the Human Rights Subcommittee, I find the portrait of the Contras as "freedom fighters" who have been betrayed by the Sandinista revolution ludicrous. With a single exception, the entire FDN—Nicaraguan Democratic Force—high command is composed of former Somoza National Guardsmen, and their human rights record is abominable. In its ninth report on human rights in Nicaragua, America's Watch states: "All of the major parties to the conflict in Nicaragua contributed to the worsening of the human rights situation * * *" and it goes on to document human rights abuses by both sides. It documents, however, the disappearance and/or killing of 12 individuals by the Sandinista government compared to some 90 by the Contras in 1985. The report states:

> Most of the abuses by the Contras during the last 6 months on which we collected testimony involved attacks that targeted individuals considered to be active supporters of the Sandinista government or activists in Sandinista organizations. The Contras went to particular homes knowing who they were looking for, and assassinated them. Much of the testimony obtained revealed gratuitous brutality: the victims were tortured or mutilated before being killed. Family members were also killed.

While our own 1985 State Department human rights country reports allude to allegations of Contra violations, the Nobel prize-winning Amnesty International group corroborates the evidence presented by America's Watch.

It stretches credulity for the President to suggest that the Sandinistas purposefully disguise themselves as Contras to commit such violence against its own supporters. It is also an offense to characterize the couragous human rights monitors as dupes of a Sandinista disinformation campaign. It is a small wonder that the Contras' campaign of terror has not promoted the formation of the type of broad-based democratic opposition we would all like to see there.

We should also listen to the advice of our neighbors to the South. As many have noted today, not a single Latin American democracy supports the Reagan administration's request for Contra funding. It runs counter to the original Contadora group goals, which called for an end to support for armed insurgencies and a halt to military build-ups in the region. On February 10, the Foreign Ministers of eight Latin American nations appealed to Secretary Schultz to end external support to irregular forces operating in the area as an "indispensable contribution to peace." Can the United States make any legitimate claim to leadership in our hemisphere when our policy only leads toward further isolation?

The active pursuit of negotiations within the Contadora framework remains the only viable means of achieving peace in this troubled region. In light of the administration's success in Haiti and the Philippines, and its recent turnabout in our policy toward Chile, one can only hope that today's vote against the aid will lead to a reassessment of our policy vis-a-vis Nicaragua and a strong and unequivocal stand in favor of the Contadora process.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains of the hour I was initially yielded?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes and 30 seconds to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Chairman, I thank you for yielding me this time.

I heard some Members refer to the issue at hand as that as one of freedom. I would like to point out that what was the problem of freedom or the issue of freedom when Somoza was in Nicaragua? What was the issue in the Philippines with Marcos? What was the issue with Baby Doc? What was the issue in Iran under the Shah?

I just would like to say this has become a political issue and a money issue. Nicaragua does not have one jet plane, ladies and gentlemen. And I would like to clarify a couple of issues and put something in perspective that I think is important.

After Watergate, Congress enacted two powerful measures to control and curtail the powers of the Executive. They were the National Emergency Act and the International Emergency Economic Powers Act. They specifically said that once the President authorizes specific actions, that within 6 months, he must come back and give the Congress a detailed report.

For anybody watching this, Congress works on a committee system. Sooner or later someone had to come before our committees and give them some facts and some evidence. Evidently no one has given us those facts. Now we are going to give $100 million where the GAO is not quite so sure where the last $27 million has gone.

I say this, Mr. President, let us turn off C-Span, let us move every unelected person out of these Chambers, and let us bring the CIA in and give us photographs, dates, documents and evidence to support your request for 14 times the appropriation in excess of your last one that we cannot find. Mr. President, specifically you are either going to have to use one of those $600 toilet seats or get off the pot here in America and quit using that 6 p.m. news broadcast and start giving these committees some facts.

We have talked about the John Wayne posture of foreign affairs in handling America's national security. Ladies and gentlemen, if you look at what happened with the Korean airliner incident, if you look at what happened with Mr. Klinghoffer, with the soldiers in El Salvador, with the incident in Beirut, Lebanon, we have talked a lot like John Wayne, but it is time for the President to put his patch on. Our problem is the Soviet Union. We are concerned about them in Nicaragua, and it is time that this Congress and the President tell the Soviet Union to stay out of Nicaragua. And $100 million is not going to be the message that comes today.

Give us the facts, Mr. President. Let Congress make an appropriate decision.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I have yet to see a coherent rationale for sending this $100 million, the purpose of which, as I understand it, is to try for a tie. No one has been arguing that we are going to send $100 million and the additional hundreds of millions that have already been spent there and sent through Honduras to win a victory. It is to get a tie, and I am not sure what the moral justification or the strategic justification is for seeking the tie. It can hardly be argued that this administration is so offended by the lack of civil liberties in Nicaragua that they will move to this, not when they continue to be as stringent as they have been to so many other right-wing regimes.

I am distressed by the lack of democracy in Nicaragua, as I am with many other countries. But I do not think the Reagan doctrine has become that we should be the 911 for the Civil Liberties Union to dispatch a couple hundred million for a proxy war when there has been, as there has been in Nicaragua, a failure to observe democratic principles.

So then the question is are we doing it for our own national security? The problem I have here is this: I myself do not find that 3 million poor people in that country are a credible threat to us. I think we ought to maintain the policy many of us have set of saying that we would act to prevent any effort by them to impinge on others. But the problem is that the President is not asking us for something that is going to achieve military success. If you buy his rhetoric, if you believe that our failure to overthrow the Sandinista government endangers the security of the United States, then the logical inference to be drawn is that ultimately we send American troops there, and I am afraid to bolster support for the not-very-well-thought-out policy lacking either moral or strategic rationale that the President is advocating, to bolster support for that they are pushing further and further in the direction of boxing themselves into where they will be forced by their own logic and rhetoric. They are putting themselves more and more into a corner.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FRANK. The gentleman has plenty of time and I only have 2 minutes. I invite the gentleman to get some time and then we can continue it that way.

□ 1700

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BILIRAKIS].

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Chairman, I strongly counter Marxist aggression in Central America and support aid to the freedom fighters.

Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a series of petitions—petitions filled with the names of residents of my district in Florida who support the President's request for aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua. All of these petitions have been received by my offices in support of a program of aid for the Contras. Also, when I polled my constituents earlier on whether they supported the President's policy to counter Marxist aggression in Central America, nearly 69 percent answered "yes."

A program of tangible, humanitarian and military support is the sole hope the world has for a Central America free of the cancer of communism. Why? Because the Marxist Sandinistas in Managua plainly intend to consolidate and intensify their dictatorship.

Promises, promises, promises. That's all we ever get from the Sandinistas.

In 1979, they promised to hold free and open elections in return for support from the Organization of American States. Well, they received the support, but they gave democracy the cold shoulder.

What the people of Nicaragua received was a sham election in which opposition parties were exiled. Trade unions have been eliminated, the news media muzzled, the church harassed, and government critics jailed. Without question, the Nicaraguan people were betrayed in their struggle for freedom.

The pluralism promised by the Sandinistas in 1979, 7 years ago, does not exist. Furthermore, there is not the slightest indication that it ever will exist, if we leave the matter in the hands of the Marxists in Managua.

If we do not, this week, vote to send the Contras the aid requested by the President, we will be ensuring the consolidation of another Communist regime in the New World. Yet another bootprint of Soviet-sponsored oppression will be made permanently on this hemisphere. The struggle for Nicaragua will end and the fight to save El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica will begin.

Why? Because no Marxist regime has shown any desire to discard dictatorship, voluntarily: Not one . . . ever . . . anywhere . . . on the face of the Earth. Nowhere in the long chronicle of human history has this abominable record been altered. And this is one promise for the future that the Sandinistas are only too willing to keep.

That is why the idea that the Sandinistas can be brought to the bargaining table without pressure is so absurd. It is an idea utterly without foundation. The United States and many other nations have bent over backward to bring the Sandinistas into negotiations. We have been waiting for 7 long years. We're still waiting. We will always be waiting, unless the Contras are given the wherewithal to defend the ideal or a pluralistic political sytem.

And make no mistake, that is what they are fighting for. The leaders of the Nicaraguan resistance—Adolfo Calero, Alfonso Robelo and Arturo Cruz—are democrats, as well as freedom fighters. And we must support them in their fight to be free of tyranny.

The allegation that the Contras are merely a collection of former Somoza followers has been thoroughly debunked. In fact, the Contra leadership is drawn almost entirely from those who opposed Somoza. Yes, there may be some former Somoza supporters among the Contras, just as there are former Marcos supporters in the Philippine Government of Corazon Aquino. How many here would be willing to condemn the Aquino government for this fact?

And what can the rest of Central America expect from a solidly entrenced Sandinista regime in Managua? With proof of United States hesitancy—proof that a no vote on Contra aid would supply—Costa Rica would be forced to accept an unilateral border agreement with the Communists. With no defense force, what choice would Costa Rica have? This would deny critically important bases to the Contras.

Likewise, Contra bases in Honduras could be eliminated, as Honduran hospitality for these bases has tended to waver in relations to United States support.

In short, there would be no bases and no Contra effort. There would be only Marxism—and Marxism inevitably expands. Indeed, we already have heard Colombian accusations of Sandinista-supplied arms reaching the M-19 guerrillas, Salvadoran accusations of Sandinista involvement with left-wing insurgents in El Salvador—as well as in the kidnaping of President Duarte's daughter. Without the Contra opposition, the Sandinistas would be free to step up this program of exported violence—with the all-too-willing financial and military help of Cuba and the Soviet Union.

A "no" vote this week would be a betrayal of the vision of freedom in which we have invested in El Salvador, and with the Contras in Nicaragua.

Not only would the hope of peace be put to flight from the region, but the United States would see a vast floodtide of refugees fleeing northward, as well. Just this week a Honduran military officer in Washington told the Wall Street Journal, "Just look at the new air base the Americans are building at Mocoron on the Atlantic coast of Honduras. It makes no military sense. But it will come in handy when all those refugees from Nicaragua have to be evacuated to Florida—including the Contras."

Voting "no" on the President's request will ensure a busy time at the Mocoron air base.

The United States can and must lead on this issue. We must not desert the Contras in their time of greatest need. For to do so would be to desert the cause of freedom itself.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, in trying to resolve how best we should respond to the situation in Central America, I do not rise today to question the wisdom or patriotism of those who may not share my view. I, too, have strong reservations regarding the choices we face. This is another of those times when honest minds differ and differ strongly. I am not sure there is a totally "right" answer.

I am not an expert on the subject of Central America. Most of my time this session has been devoted to the problems we face in agriculture. But, like my colleagues, I have a keen interest and responsibility. I have been to the briefings by the appropriate agencies. I have read reams of material. I have not been to Central American, but I have talked at length with those who have. And, more to the point, I have visited with the people of my district who are very concerned.

The letter I received from one of my country bankers is typical of this concern.

DEAR PAT: Yesterday, I had the sad task of telling a 55-year-old farmer and his wife that, because Farmers Home Administration has no money for a direct loan that could have kept them in business, they would have to liquidate their farm holdings and leave the farm.

As much as I hated to tell these people that they would have to liquidate, I had convinced myself that these things had to happen, and that when our country was trying its best to cut deficit spending, there had to be a certain amount of fallout from cutbacks on funding for Federal programs.

Then I picked up my newspaper this morning.

The headline said: "Reagan to seek $100 million to help Contras." How in the world can we sit by and watch our farmers leave their farms because funding that might help them supposedly is not available and yet we seem to have funds to help people in another country?

Now, Mr. Chairman, given the adversity we face in farm country, that is a very good question.

But, answer the question we must.

As I understand it, this $100 million comes from the Pentagon budget. It is not new money. That is an important point.

Now, there are few in Congress who have a greater aversion to spending other people's money than I do. And, I have no desire to go meddling in someone else's back forty at a time when our farmers need assistance so desperately. At the same time, this is no time to be penny wise and pound foolish. Look beyond agriculture's pasture fence, if you will, to see what is coming up the road and what may soon be at our gates.

The intentions of the Sandinistas are clear. During the first 18 months of the Sandinista government, the United States gave the Sandinistas $119 million in aid. Compare that to $224 million given Somoza over a period of 20 years. In appreciation, they conducted a military buildup unprecedented in the history of Central America. Costa Rica, a neighbor without an army, could have troops and tanks in its capital of San Jose within 12 hours. The situation could be much the same for other nations in the region.

Now, I'm not trying to use scare tactics or tell you the domino theory is fact. But, given the statements and actions of the Sandinistas themselves, these are realistic assumptions. They have pledged to spread the revolution beyond the borders of Nicaragua. And, that is exactly what they have been doing. They have been and are providing weapons to the insurgents and terrorists in El Salvador. When there is aid to the Contras, the flow of those weapons and the rate of terrorist activities lessens. When there is not, they increase.

If the Sandinistas are given free reign to do as they have promised, the only check on their assertiveness will be the U.S. military, not to mention an uncontrollable flood of refugees into this country. I can sure think of other places for the $100 million to go. But the cost of doing nothing and facing the unpleasant but predictable consequences will be far greater in farm country and to every American.

Will the $100 million do the job? I have my doubts. Will it prevent the Sandinistas from completing the 11,000-foot airfield they would have us believe is being built for crop dusters? Will it cause the Sandinistas to think twice about finishing the deep water port to serve as a base for Soviet submarines? Will it lessen the flow of arms and terrorist activities in El Salvador and other nations of the region? Will this assistance reduce the number within current refugee camps and the real possibility of refugees in this country? Will the $100 million cause Mr. Ortega and his cohorts to restore the civil liberties taken away by edict last October—liberties I might add that we all enjoy and take for granted in this country? Will the newspaper La Prinza be able to go to press and print the truth as opposed to submitting their galley proofs for censorship?

In truth, no one knows for sure the answer to these tough questions. The $100 million may not be enough. But, I do know that without this assistance there is no way, no remote scenario, under which the Sandinistas will relinquish power and restore individual freedoms through the process of negotiation.

We must face up to that cost—both in dollars and human suffering of what we will do when that airfield is complete, when the deep water port is a working base for Soviet submarines, when the Sandinista revolution is spread throughout the region, and when refugees, already growing in number, flee and come to this country, when in the course of the 68-year history of takeover by Communists, those individual rights are never restored. Measured against the cost of all these things, I think the $100 million represents the proper and prudent course of action.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, I've been watching this debate very closely since we began early this afternoon, and I was struck by what can only be described as chronic deja vu. I'm going to try not to impugn motives or question patriotism. But I would like to emphasize a clear historical trend which supports the allegations recently made in Washington that one of our political parties has indeed acted, whether intentionally or not, as "the coguarantor of the Brezhnev doctrine" and "the pallbearer of democracy" in the Western hemisphere.

Watching the debate I was struck by the similarity of the arguments espoused during the 1980–81 debate over U.S. assistance to El Salvador. I'd like to quote a few of my colleagues, some of whom have since left Congress, but their arguments endure. One of the most representative arguments of this school of thought was summed up by one of my Democrat colleagues on February 26, 1981. He said:

U.S. military support for the Duarte regime in El Salvador is a tragic mistake, directly contrary to our own ideals and national interests, and chilling in its parallels to the early days of U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

Instead of comparing U.S. policy in Nicaragua to that of Vietnam, why not compare it to our efforts in El Salvador? I point to El Salvador as a net success of American foreign policy. We all know about the relatively free and open elections, and the progress that the Duarte government has made toward creating a more open society. Because of U.S. support, El Salvador is well on its way to a free and democratic society.

Hindsight is always 20–20, but why not learn from our experiences in El Salvador and apply them to Nicaragua. Today, I have heard, nearly verbatim, the warnings issued by some Members during the debate over aid to El Salvador. I would like to read a few of these statements against aid in 1981.

First, they said we are not supporting a popular movement. On February 26, 1981, a Member of this body was heard to say:

Our own intelligence agencies will admit, when pressed, that the Duarte government has almost no base of popular support, and that it would not even be a major contender in a fairly contested election.

He went on to state that it is nonsense to describe this government as * * * a force for democracy in El Salvador.

Where would El Salvador be today if those supporting freedom had lost the debate in 1982? Where will the forces of freedom be in Nicaragua if the Sandinistas are encouraged to continue their oppressive policies?

Another member stated on February 24, 1981 once again during the debate over aid to El Salvador:

The consequences of deeper U.S. military commitment cannot be ignored. There is a grave risk that more American personnel will be committed—and that more American lives will be lost. Then we may find ourselves on the precipice of full-scale military intervention.

Last time I checked we have not invaded El Salvador, nor have we increased the number of advisers stationed in that country. I would like to conclude by quoting one of the most eloquent Members of this House, the distinguished majority leader who stated on February 3, 1982, while discussing El Salvador:

I cannot imagine succumbing once again to the siren song of those who would sell down the river the responsible people who are trying to have a stable, free, democratic government on behalf of those who would follow the example of Castro's Cuba.

Let's not sell down the river the only chance we have to achieve a democratic government in Nicaragua. I'm tired of hearing the same old lines from the "peace-at-any-cost" lobby. If this lobby would have won the debate in 1982, El Salvador would probably be another Cuba today.

Mr. McCAIN. May I inquire of the Chair how much time remains for both sides?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona has 1 hour and 59 minutes of total time remaining. The majority side has 2 hours, 8½ minutes total time remaining.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, last May I accompanied a National Guard unit from my district to Honduras for 2 weeks of training. I also visited Panama, Nicaragua, and El Salvador, and met with government officials, businesspeople, Contra leaders, and ordinary people.

I saw a region struggling with poverty and suffering from huge gaps in wealth. I learned about the daily battle facing most people just to get by, no matter who's in power. And I learned about the strong awareness of our country's role in the region.

Mr. Chairman, at the same time I represent an area that has been devastated by Reaganomics. In rural counties farmers are losing their farms. Rural communities are shrinking as farm-dependent businesses shut their doors.

In the cities, more than one-tenth of our workers are still without jobs. Thousands of jobless factory workers from John Deere, Caterpillar, and International Harvester are lined up for retraining programs, which this administration has targeted for cuts. Real estate values are at rockbottom, and hard-pressed local governments are enacting tax increases or cutting needed services to make ends meet.

Meanwhile, the President wants to spend $100 million on the Contras. He demands millions for bullets for Central America, while the unemployed, our veterans, the handicapped and poor must bite the bullet here at home. These priorities are badly misordered.

When our own citizens are facing budget cuts in student loans, agriculture, and job training programs, I cannot support sending $100 million to the Contras. Their leadership is largely the remnants of Somoza's National Guard. And the General Accounting Office can't even account for much of the $27 million the Contras received last year.

I wish the President would turn his attention to the 15 million Americans without jobs and the hundreds of families losing their farms every day. We in Congress should concentrate on those problems, and not send more taxpayer dollars to support war in Central America.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong opposition to the President's proposal to give $100 million in aid to the Contras attempting to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. Over the past few weeks, and especially today, many of my colleagues have expressed their various positions on this issue. So have my constituents from the city of Chicago. The mail and the phone calls have been overwhelming, both in their number, and in their opposition to the President's plan. For every person who has contacted my office in support of the President's plan, 29 people have spoken against it.

It is clear to me that this policy is not only unpopular, but unrealistic. We need to re-examine our Nation's priorities. Why do we want to increase the amount of funds that we spend for the war in Central America while reducing the amount that we spend for our own citizens? How can we criticize other nations for intervening in the affairs of other countries, and then turn around and do it ourselves?

How can I tell the 16,000 teenagers in the city of Chicago that we cannot afford to give them jobs this summer, but we can afford to give guns, bullets, and other weapons to men who rape, pillage, and murder for a living? What kind of lesson will they learn from that?

Mr. CONYERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONYERS. I want to commend the gentleman, and associate myself with his remarks, because he is the author of the Jobs and Income Act that speaks to the economic plight generations of young people have been in, and I am very glad to associate myself with him, because he uses a rational tone of voice in putting his arguments over. In other words, he is not hysterical, he is not impassioned, he is not accusing anybody of being Communist that I have heard recently, and it just makes me feel good to know that the gentleman is advocating this position.

Mr. HAYES. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Chairman, how can I tell hungry schoolchildren in Chicago that we will be unable to make certain that they are given all of their immunizations, but that we will give food and medicine to the Contras in Nicaragua?

How can I tell the Mayor of the city of Chicago that we must reduce personnel in the city's police and fire departments because we are making Central America safer?

I cannot, and I will not. There is no justification for our misguided priorities. The President has declared that he is a Contra. I want to declare that I am an American. The President supports the Contras, but the American people are the ones who need our support.

Mr. CONYERS. Did the gentleman say the President said he is a Contra?

Mr. HAYES. That is right.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY].

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, I support those wonderful fighting boys in Nicaragua that are fighting for freedom, and support $100 million to be sent to their aid.

Mr. Chairman, since I've come to Congress, sometimes I feel like I'm a passenger in a car in which the driver has one hand on the wheel and the other over his eyes—and if he is told that the road curves left, he is willing to court disaster and blindly turn the wheel without making sure of the facts—when all he's got to do to avoid crashing—is take his hand away from his eyes. Since Congress hand seems to be tightly fixed over its eyes, blindly courting disaster, I would like to use my time trying to remove that hand.

It might be unpleasant for some, but it is now time to take a long hard look at the accusations of atrocities directed at both the Sandinistas government and the democratic opposition. It's time for those opposing aid to do more than trot out the same, well worn, allegations of freedom fighter atrocities while only reluctantly conceding that the Sandinistas are a bad government. It is time for them to face the fact that it has been overwhelmingly established that the Sandinista government has adopted a calculated, systematic policy of committing atrocities to intimidate the population and achieve absolute control over all aspects of society. There is no corresponding documentation to shown the same of the freedom fighters.

Rather than play atrocity poker—I see your atrocity and raise you two atrocities—lets start by realizing that atrocities have been committed by both sides. Unfortunately, there happens to be a war for freedom going on in Nicaragua. Sadly, atrocities are a tragic by-product of war—even one fought for the most noble causes.

First, let's discuss the question of whether or not the freedom fighters actually commit atrocities as a means of advancing their cause. After much research, I have found the answer to be without question—no. How can I be sure of this? And that is a fair question. It is because most of the documentation of Contra atrocities have come from groups whose motives and sources of information are suspect. Groups such as Witness for Peace, the Washington Office on Latin America, Americas Watch, the Brody Report, and even Christopher Dickey's book, "With the Contras," have proven to be at the least very misleading and at the worst, outright fabrications. Let me give you some examples.

The 1985 human rights report issued by WOLA, the Washington Office of Latin America, accusing the freedom fighters of atrocities was instigated by the New York law firm of Riechler & Applebaum. This firm is registered with the Justice Department as an agent of the FSLN—and their 1985 report was prepared by Witness for Peace which operates in Nicaragua with the personal permission of Interior Minister Tomas Borge. Keep in mind that this revelation was made by a Witness for Peace steering committee member, Joyce Hollyday. Their views are hardly an objective perspective from which to approach such serious accusations.

The Brody report, which lists alleged Contra atrocities, was thoroughly discredited by the testimony of a man in a position to know the truth—Mr. Bayardo Payan, a former official of the Sandinista accounts department responsible for paying Mr. Brody's expenses. Another less than objective perspective. Mr. Payan's testimony was given before the House Western Hemisphere Subcommittee on April 18, 1985. He said, "I believe that the report given by Mr. Brody is nothing more than a propaganda job."

With regard to the activities of the former Contra known as Suicida, reported on by Mr. Dickey, the fact is that this lunatic and his adherents were arrested and executed by the Contra high command for their crimes. The point is; he was stopped. In fact under an umbrella organization called UNO, the democratic opposition has created an autonomous human rights organization, which is based in Costa Rica. The commission's executive council is composed of human rights activists such as Antonio Ruiz, who was an original member of Nicaragua's Permanent Commission on Human Rights—which was created to monitor Somoza's abuses. Another member, Ismael Reyes was former president of the Nicaraguan Red Cross. This is an obvious effort—along with human rights instruction to trainees—to do all that is possible in a time of war to monitor rights abuses.

Again, I am not saying that atrocities did not—and do not—happen. But there is simply no reputable evidence that this is the democratic opposition's policy. How can it be when their very survival depends on the friendship and active support of the people? How can it be when over 85 percent of the FDN is made up of campesinoss or country boys? And how can it be when they started with only a few dozen and have grown into a highly motivated force of 20,000 men and women?

Now, lets look at the Sandinistas. The documention of atrocities in their case, as opposed to the democratic opposition, comes from reputable sources. The most important source, Alvaro Baldizon, is the former chief investigator for the Sandinista Ministry of the Interior.

Alvaro Baldizon was an insider in the Sandinista government—an avowed Marxist-Leninist—who left the Government because he saw that the promise of communism is not the same in reality as it is on paper. He found that a Communist government can commit any atrocity necessary to further their goals with absolute impunity. They recognize no moral inperatives. The end—consolidating power in their hands—justifies any means.

Let me quote Mr. Baldizon, "The Contras do not have a policy of committing abuses while the Sandinistas do. When Contra abuses occurred, they appeared to be motivated by revenge." Another of his statements illustrates the duplicity of the Sandinists and their active—and apparently successful—disinformation campaign. He said that in some instances civilians who were accompanying military convoys were caught in an ambush and reported as abuses. He estimated that for every Contra abuses there were 10 committed by the Government—and it was his job to know of government abuses.

Additionally, Baldizon reports of platoons coming back from training in East Germany in 1981 to dress as Contras to lure unsuspecting possible antirevolutionaries close enough to kill them. Again, in 1982, two platoons returned from East Germany, bought bolts of blue material, boots and canteens from Panama. Their goal this time was to commit atrocities and blame them on the Contras. By the way, Capt. Marco Arvelo who led the first group is now second in command of state security.

Now, let's apply the same commonsense criteria that was applied to the democratic opposition. How can this—a systematic policy of atrocities—be when the Sandinistas rely on their friendship with the people for survivial? Obviously, they don't. They have built the largest military in Central America. They have built 19 prisons for those who oppose their rule—this in contrast to the 2 that the tyrannical despot Somoza built. They have closed all but one state run radio station and two state run television stations. Under Somoza there were 50 radio and 3 television stations!

How can this be when their huge 120,000 man military is made up of the people, don't they need their support? No; of course not. They have implemented a system of forced draft for everyone over the age of 12 years old. But, what is wrong with a draft, you ask? We've done it. The difference is that the Sandinistas surround villages, parks, theaters and even break into households where young men and boys are. Often, families don't know where their loved ones are taken. And last, how can it be when the Sandinistas are writing a constitution? Of course, their mentors in the Soviet Union have a constitution. The Soviet Constitution is a constitution that evidently legalizes activities like dropping bombs shaped like toys for young Afghan children to pick up and have a hand or arm blown off. Somehow, I don't think that Sandinista atrocities will cause them to fall out of favor with a government that practices these activities.

As in any policy question there are two fundamental questions we must ask ourselves—what are the implications of doing it and what are the implications if we don't. If we aid the freedom fighters we have a chance—First of containing these abuses and second, to turn this situation around. If we don't this systematic policy of the Sandinistas will be used to destabilize their neighbor's government's will be impossible to stop.

While the light may be alot to handle when you eyes have been covered—please attempt to pull your hand away, brave the light, look at what is actually there—not what you hope will be there to help you rationalize your vote. If you do, for the good of Central America, for the good of Nicaraguans, and for the good of our own national security—you'll cast your vote for freedom.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, earlier today some accusations were made about the documentation of human rights violations by the Contras of Nicaraguan citizens; and the suggestion was that the only documentation of those human rights violations was from some report that was paid for by the Sandinista government.

The fact is that the documentation of those human rights violations is well documented by Amnesty International. As Amnesty International says:

NICARAGUA: THE HUMAN RIGHTS RECORD

1. AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL CONCERNS IN BRIEF

Amnesty International's concerns in Nicaragua include a pattern of frequent, although generally short-term, imprisionment of prisoners of conscience; prolonged pretrial incommunicado detention of political prisoners, and restrictions on their right to a fair trial; and poor prison conditions for political prisoners. Amnesty International has received some reports of torture, arbitrary killings and unacknowledged detention carried out by military personel in remote areas undergoing armed conflict. However, the organization has also received information on the public trial and imprisonment of military personnel found responsible for such abuses. In the course of 1984 and 1985 Amnesty International took action on behalf of 12 prisoners it believed were prisoners of conscience or probable prisoners of conscience.

Since 1981 Amnesty International has also been concerned about the frequently reported torture, mutilation, and execution-style killing of captives by irregular military forces opposing the Nicaraguan Government. Forces believed to have been responsible for a persistent pattern of such abuses include those acting under the name Fuerza Democratica Nicaraquense (FDN), Nicaraguan Democratic Force, the estimated 10,000-strong force operating since 1982 from permanment bases in neighboring Honduras; and the largely Miskito Indian force, MISURA, with its primary military base in the Honduran hamlet Rus Rus. Some killings of captives have been attributed to forces of the Costa Rican-based opposition force Alianza Revolucionaria Democratica (ARDE), Democratic Revolutionary Alliance.

Amnesty International's policy is to condemn the killing or torture of captives by anyone, including both government forces and those of opposition groups. However, the organization takes action only with respect to governments, since they are the entities bound by the international legal standards which Amnesty International seeks to uphold. It addresses itslef to governments which engage directly in human rights violations falling within Amnesty International's mandate and to governments which support or condone the commission of such abuses by other forces. The organization may also take action with respect to abuses carried out by certain non-governmental entities which, while not necessarily recognized formally as governments, have some governmental attributes such as the effective control of territory.

2. THE BACKGROUND TO AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL'S CONCERNS

2.1 HUMAN RIGHTS IN THE AFTERMATH OF THE NICARAGUAN REVOLUTION

An estimated 40,000 to 50,000 Nicaraguans died in the course of the insurrection against the government of Anastasio Somoza Debayle, between 1974 and that government's overthrow on 17 July 1979. Amnesty International's concerns throughout that period centered on the Somoza government's detention of prisoners of conscience, and its use of torture, extrajudicial execution, and "disappearance" to deal with those it believed represented actual or protential opposition. In the final years of civil conocimiento de los mandos superiores"). The report does not indicate the time period within which such cases were reported in Special Zone One, whether individuals other than those reported to have "disappeared" in 1982 were reported as victims, or whether those responsible for such actions had been the subject of investigation and disciplinary action. Amnesty International is concerned that the use of the term "Special Measures" to describe the apparent summary executions of 1982 suggests that in certain circumstances such actions were tolerated by higher authorities and that their occurrence was deliberately concealed. Amnesty International will continue to seek public clarification of the cases of the reported "disappearances" of July to October 1982.

4. HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSE AND FOREIGN OR DOMESTIC OPPOSITION FORCES

Human rights violations in Nicaragua have been reported in the context of prolonged armed conflict. In addition to human rights violations attributed to the Government of Nicaragua, a pattern of abuses by armed opposition forces has been reported in the course of this conflict, including the routine torture and summary execution of captives. Amnesty International condemns as a matter of principle the torture or killing of prisoners under any circumstances, whether by governmental forces or non-governmental forces such as domestic opposition groups. The organization addresses only governments directly, as entities bound by international human rights agreements. Amnesty International takes action when governments are directly engaged in human rights violations and when they support or condone their perpetration by other agents.

4.1 ALLEGATIONS OF TORTURE AND SUMMARY EXECUTIONS OF DETAINEES BY OPPOSITION FORCES

Since 1981 reports have been regularly received of detentions, torture and summary execution by armed opposition forces, with most reports coming from the areas of Jinotega and Matagalpa bordering Honduras, and the Atlantic Coast region. Victims of reported summary execution by forces associated with the FDN included a Miskito, José Cornejo, who was released in the December 1983 amnesty, and his wife. José Cornejo was reportedly accused by opposition forces of collaborating with the Nicaraguan authorities and as a consequence he and his wife were reportedly captured and killed in late January 1984 near the hamlet Yulo.

Others captured were reportedly taken to bases in Honduras or Costa Rica. Amnesty International appealed to the Honduran authorities in December 1982 after lay church leaders Maria Eugenia de Barreda and her husband Felipe Barreda were seized by FDN forces while working as teachers near the Honduran border, taken across the border, and reportedly transported by Honduran army forces to the town of Danli where they and other Nicaraguan captives were reportedly held and interrogated. According to detailed reports, from captives who escaped FDN/Honduran custody at Danli, the Barredas had been severely beaten. Other reports maintained that Maria Eugenia de Barreda had been repeatedly raped and was held bound and gagged. The bodies of the two were reportedly found near Danli several months later.

More recently, Amnesty, International appealed to the Honduran authorities after the seizure by FDN forces in Nicaragua's Jinotega department of five student teachers on 28 September, 1984, and another on 5 October and their reported removal across the border to Honduras. In mid-November 1985 it was reported that one of them had escaped. She told a press conference in Managua that she had been held inside Honduras for part of her captivity, where she was raped and tortured. She believed that four of her colleagues may have been killed by the FDN. The detention of the fifth teacher remains unconfirmed and the Honduran authorities have made no response to inquiries about her fate and that of other captives reportedly taken to the FDN's Las Vegas camp.

In a similar case, forestry technicians Fausto Cristy and Jorge Canales, both Nicaraguans, and Regine Schmemann, a citizen of the Federal Republic of Germany, were seized on 14 June 1985 by forces of the largely Miskito Indian group MISURA while working north of Puerto Cabezas in Zelaya Department. They were subsequently taken into Honduran territory to the MISURA camp at Srum Laya. Following international protests, Regine Schmemann was removed from Srum Laya on 2 July by a delegation of three men, one whom was identified as a Honduran army officer. According to Regine Schmemann's testimony, the army escort was made aware that her two companions remained in custody at Srum Laya, but made no effort to assist them. She was subsequently taken first to a Honduran army command post in Gracias a Dios province, and then to the capital, Tegucigalpa, where she was handed over to a representative from her country's embassy and members of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

According to the account given to Amnesty International by Regine Schmemann, each of the three captives was threatened with executive while in MISURA custody. It is believed that her presence, as a citizen of the Federal Republic of Germany, may have provided some protection for her companions, and that there is now considerable danger to the lives of these Nicaraguan civilians. On 12 August 1985 Amnesty International telexed the president of the Republic of Honduras to welcome the reported steps taken by the Honduran army to secure the release of Regine Schmemann, and urged that similar measures be taken to ensure the physical safety of Fausto Cristy and Jorge Canales and to secure their immediate release.

While some prisoners were reportedly taken to bases outside Nicaragua by opposition forces, the forces of the FDN where more frequently reported to retain no prisoners, killing captives on the spot or after brief field interrogations. In some areas they reportedly killed their captives before the assembled residents of target communities. Witnesses of such killings of relatives and neighbours, and FDN personnel who have deserted the force, have described in detailed testimonies made available to Amnesty International execution style killings in which captives were bound, tortured, and their throats slit by FDN forces. In some cases captives were shot dead or beheaded. The number of captives tortured and put to death by FDN forces since 1981 is impossible to determine, but is believed to total several hundred.

4.1.1. INTERNATIONAL DIMENSIONS TO ABUSES BY OPPOSITION FORCES

The international dimension of abuses of the rights of prisoners includes both the frequent removal of opposition forces' captives to Honduran and Costa Rican bases and evidence that the armed forces of the FDN are supported, instructed and directed by agencies of foreign governments.

A United States Government role in the FDN's development was first formally acknowledged in early 1982 in the US Congress. A November 1981 executive order was reported to have instructed that government's Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to assist the development of the FDN as a military force (with a provision of $19.0 million special funding for that purpose). Although US government representatives acknowledged assistance to equip, train and assist the FDN as a paramilitary force, a US government role in the creation of, or direction of the FDN has been denied.

Amnesty International has analyzed a copy of a field manual issued to FDN forces, which proposes the public "neutralization" of civilians believed to collaborate with the Nicaraguan Government as a model "use of violence for propagandistic effects". The manual, which received widspread publicity in late 1984, also proposes the selective assassination of civilian local government officials, police, and military personnel. US government representatives acknowledged that a US agency has issued the manual—"Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare"—to FDN forces, and maintained it has been issued as a means of exerting greater control over irregular forces receiving US assistance in combatting the Nicaraguan construed as US support for assassinations or executions, but said that it would be recalled and reissued without reference to "neutralizations".

Despite the stated official interpretation of the manual's significance, the distribution of the "psyschlogical operations" manual was harshly criticized in US Congressional arenas, notably the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives, in part because of its human rights implications. In the Committee's public report of 5 January 1985 it said that a copy of the manual had been provided to it by a journalist in September 1984 and that subsequently "CIA confirmed that the manual had been written by the CIA in 1983 for use in the 'covert' war against Nicaragua". As a consequence, the Committee said that it had initiated its own investigation into the matter, in order to determine whether violations of US law had occurred:

"The Committee found that the manual was written and printed up on several editions by the CIA. The manual talks of overthrowing the Sandinistas. This raises the question of whether the Boland Amendment was violated.[1]

"The manual talks of 'neutralizing' Sandinista officials and creating martyrs. This raises the question of whether Executive Order 12333, which prohibits assassinations, was violated. The manual also talks of shooting civilians trying to leave a captured town, blackmailing others to work for the contras,[2] and endangering innocent people by inciting violence in mass demonstrations . . ."

The Committee concluded that the manual did violate the law. However it supported CIA denials that the law had been deliberately flouted, attributing the manual's writing and distribution to the ignorance of minor officials and the negligence of their superiors:

"The Committee was told that all CIA officers should have known about the Executive Order's ban on assassination and about the Boland Amendment, but some did not . . . The incident of the manual illustrates once again to a majority of the Committee that the CIA did not have adequate command and control of the entire Nicaragua covert action . . . A majority of the Committee concludes that the manual represents a violation of the Boland Amendment. CIA officials up the chain of command either never read the manual or were never aware of it. Negligence, not intent to violate the law, marked the manual's history. The Committee concluded that there was no intentional violation of Executive Order 12333."

Critics of the FDN's routine torture and execution of captives, and the "Psychological Operations" manual included the FDN's own press spokesman and member of its executive of seven Edgar Chamorro. Edgar Chamorro was expelled from the FDN in early 1985 as an apparent consequence of his critical statements. He subsequently made detailed assertions that the FDN had been created and was directed by the CIA, and attributed its record of human rights abuse to the operational command of the force by "former National Guardsmen who . . . stifle internal dissent and intimidate or murder those who dare oppose them."

Widespread publicity about the "Psychological Operations" manual, and detailed reporting[3] of continued cases of torture and murder of captives attributed to FDN and MISURA forces in the course of 1985 have resulted in little apparent change in the operational tactics applied by these forces.

Some action was taken by the Government of Honduras to respond to press reports suggesting its complicity in FDN-MISURA abuses. In January 1985 MISURA leader Steadman Fagoth Muller was ordered to leave Honduras after a widely publicized threat made at a press conference in the Honduran capital to "execute" 23 Nicaraguan soldiers he said were in MISURA's custody. The fate of the 23 alleged captives was apparently never established, however, and Steadman Fagoth Muller reportedly returned to Honduras after several months in the USA. While in the USA, moreover, he reportedly defended his forces' policy of summary execution in a meeting with staff of members of the US Senate and referred to a list of people facing execution, six of whom he said had already been put to death.

In September 1985 the FDN's titular head, civilian Adolfo Calero responded directly to criticism of FDN atrocities by announcing the adoption of a "code of conduct" establishing norms for the treatment of civilians and prisoners. Amnesty International has not yet obtained a copy of the code or received information on its implementation.

We also find out from Americas Watch that—

All of the major parties to the conflict in Nicaragua contributed to the worsening of the human rights situation in that country during the past year.

The Nicaraguan Government escalated its attack on freedom of expression, interfered with religious freedom, jailed hundreds of its political opponents, further restricted due process of law and forcibly relocated many thousands of its citizens. Though the Nicaraguan Government points to the severe military threat that it faces to justify these actions, Americas Watch's investigation persuades us that most of its repressive acts do not bear the direct relationship to that threat that would make them permissible under international law.

Military attacks by the opposition forces, widely known as Contras, diminished during 1985 but human rights abuses by them did not. Americas Watch itself obtained testimony on some ninety murders and disappearances by the Contras during 1985. Also, we have gathered information on additional abuses that they committed during the first two months of 1986. The record demonstrates that during the last six months, in the area of Central Zelaya where most Contra military activity is now concentrat-

[1] This was an amendment to the US Defense Appropriations bill for fiscal year 1983 which prohibited the use of funds "to furnish military equipment, military training or advice, or other support for military activities, to any group of individual, not part of a country's armed forces, for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua and Honduras." The bill was signed into law in December 1982. (See Report on the Activities of the Permanent Select Committee on Inteligence of the House of Representatives during the Ninety-Eighth Congress, January 2, 1985 (US Government Printing Office Washington).

[2] "Contra" is a term widely used in Nicaragua and the United States to describe the armed forces opposing the Nicaraguan Government and is a contraction of the Spanish term "contra-revolucionarios", counter revolutionaries.

[3] See, for example, The Americas Watch Committee Violations of the Laws of War by Both Sides in Nicaragua—1981-1985, March 1985, and the First supplement to the same report, JUNE 1985, and Reed Brody, Attacks by the Nicaraguan "Contras" on the civilian population of Nicaragua: Report of a Fact-Finding Mission, September 1984-January 1985.

ed, they repeatedly sought out those they considered to be Sandinista activists and mutilated and murdered them. The Union Nicaraguense de Oposicion (UNO), the political organization that unites the principal Contra forces, proclaimed that it would promote respect for human rights by its own forces, and has established a well-funded and professionally-staffed human rights organization.

So to put to rest the cheap shots, to suggest that somehow there is not accurate documentation of the atrocities by the Contras, I have entered these into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. If I have additional time.

Mr. BARNES. I do not have the time to yield to the gentleman. Perhaps the gentleman on the other side of the aisle does.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN] controls the time.

Mr. MCCAIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would recommend to the gentleman from California that there are going to be some special orders this evening, and I hope we will be able to enjoy a spirited debate, and hope he can hang around for it.

The CHAIRMAN, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HUTTO].

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Contras fighting for freedom in Nicaragua. I realize that this is an issue with strong feelings on both sides, and I respect those views on the part of the Members.

I came to the Congress in 1979, and it was not long after that until the revolution took place in Nicaragua; and there was great hope on the part of the Nicaraguan people that they would be out from under the oppression of the dictator Somoza, but it did not happen that way.

I remember shortly after that time there was debate on this floor on whether or not to send $75 million in aid to the new government in Nicaragua to see if we could not influence the Nicaraguan regime and to swing them over to the democratic side.

Not being disposed to vote for much foreign aid, I was inclined to vote against the $75 million, but I remember very vividly the late and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Clem Zablocki.

The last thing he said in that debate is, "It may not work, but we've got to try."

□ 1710

And that convinced me that I should vote for it. I voted for the $75 million in aid and took a lot of flak for it. Of course it was not spent because as you know we know how things turned out there. I had the opportunity to visit in Nicaragua along with my colleagues about 3 years ago and we visited the Sandinista junta members as well as Obando y Bravo, then bishop, now cardinal, with businessmen, with the Chamorro family of La Prensa. And we found out about the oppression that was taking place in Nicaragua. It is still there perhaps even worse than under Somoza. I say that we cannot establish another Cuba, another Communist regime in Central America and that is why I support the $100 million in aid to the Contras.

In Florida we are especially aware of the problem because of our proximity and we have been unloaded on by the Cuban dictator Fidel Castro. We do not want this to continue. The Soviets have put $500 million or more into Nicaragua. And does anyone think if we do not send money to the Contras that there will not be a continuation of this move by the Communists to gain further footholds in Central America? Of course not. They will continue on.

So we must continue to do what we can and put the pressure on the Sandinista regime.

I would like for the Contadora process to work and maybe one of these days it will but you know they will not talk to the Contras or the freedom fighters and it must be done before we can have the right kind of freedom in Nicaragua and discontinue the kind of oppression that is there.

So let us help the Contras for the sake of freedom and as Clem Zablocki said back in 1979 we must try it, it is the least we can do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] has 1½ minutes remaining.

Mr. BARNES. I yield my remaining time to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HERTEL].

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we are all opposed to the Sandinistas denying freedom to the people of Nicaragua. But I want to evaluate what our policy should be under the doctrine set out November 28 by a speech of our Secretary of Defense in 1984 when Mr. Weinberger gave this speech enunciating when we should use Armed Forces. He said: "If we do decide to commit forces to combat overseas we should have clearly defined political and military objectives. And we should know precisely how our forces can accomplish those clearly defined objectives. And we should have and send the forces needed to do just that."

Mr. Weinberger also said, "Before the United States commits combat forces abroad there must be some reasonable assurance we will have the support of the American people and their elected representatives in Congress."

Then Mr. Weinberger came before the Committee on Armed Services and gave testimony just last month and I asked him what our clear military objectives were. I asked him how much money it would take and how long. I asked him if American trainers would be used or American forces. Mr. Weinberger's reply in open testimony, "I don't have my crystal ball with me, Mr. HERTEL, and I can't tell you all of the answers to all of those questions."

I asked him later on about the very same thing, what is the military objectives, how long, how much, are American trainers involved in the future, American forces involved, how much will it cost, what are our military objectives? He said again that of course he could not tell me.

Again what Mr. Weinberger said last year, November 1984:

> The point that we must keep uppermost in our minds if we ever decide to commit forces to combat we must support those forces to the fullest to show our national will for so long as it takes to win. So we must have in mind objectives that are clearly defined and understood and supported by the widest possible number of our citizens.

And that test of Mr. Weinberger has not been met in this debate or met by the administration in answering our questions.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I am standing in for the chairman of the full Committee on Armed Services.

The CHAIRMAN. As a representative of the Committee on Armed Services, the Chair now recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS].

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman seek additional time?

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. I do.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I want to quote again from Mr. Weinberger's speech of November 28, 1984, when he enunciated when Armed Forces should be used. He quoted Clausewitz, who had written:

> No one starts a war—or rather, no one in his senses ought to do so—without first being clear in his mind what he intends to achieve by that war and how he intends to conduct it.

Again the Secretary of Defense had this responsibility of enunciating a policy as to when Armed Forces should be used. He quotes Clausewitz and again we see these questions are not answered by the proposal of $100 million in military aid to the Contras.

Mr. Weinberger also said that "the relationship between our objectives and the forces we have committed, the size, composition, and disposition must be continually reassessed and adjusted if necessary. Conditions and objectives invariably change during the course of the conflict. When they do change, then our combat requirements must also change."

What he has done is left the door open, left the door open because as Mr. Weinberger said, "War may be different today than in Clausewitz's time but the need for well-defined objectives and a consistent strategy is still essential. If we determine that a combat mission has become necessary for our vital national interests then we must send forces capable to do the job and not assign a combat mission to a force configured for peacekeeping."

All I am trying to do today is evaluate the administration's policy and request for $100 million in military aid for the Contras, to evaluate that in light of the standards established by our Secretary of Defense just a few short months ago. And then I take that, with his answers to my questions, to meet his own criteria of clear military objectives, of having the American people's strong support, of achieving victory and I see they do not match up. That is what we have been hearing from the Members of Congress in this debate. The questions cannot be answered. We, as much as we are opposed to freedom being denied the people of Nicaragua, are not going to give an open-ended blank check. We are opposed to sending American forces and we still do not have an answer of the administration as to their position on that.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding because a lot of us feel as though your side has not been willing to answer questions. A lot of us have stood up, asked people to yield when they were making these statements and we just have not gotten any answer.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Does the gentleman have a question for me?

Mr. WALKER. Well, for one thing I would say to the gentleman that the statements that he is using of "Cap" Weinberger's are a year and a half old. A lot of change has taken place in the last year and a half.

When I was in Nicaragua this past weekend the Nicaraguan people were saying down there that much has changed there in the last year.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. OK. You have made the statement, now I will answer that statement.

Mr. Weinberger has not changed his policy of when Armed Forces should be used. Now if he wants to set a different standard for other nations as to when forces should be used such as the Contras, such as mercenaries, something of that sort, I guess he could enunciate a different policy.

But he has not backed down or changed his policy at all. He just has not met the mark. He just does not have a policy regarding the Contras in Nicaragua that meets his own standards for when Armed Forces should be used.

Clearly from his statement in November 1984, surely from this major speech that the Secretary of Defense gave in November 1984 as to when military Armed Forces should be used, his criteria of having strong support and lasting support of the American people, his criteria of clear military objectives are not met by this $100 million proposal. We have seen that throughout this debate, in past debates about this policy of this administration. It is wrong, and that is why the House will reject it, and that is why the American people are opposed to it.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. STENHOLM.]

Mr. STENHOLM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, today we have two choices. They are not simple choices. We can either decide to shape or continue to watch events in Central America. We must decide whether we want to remain passive and allow others to shape our national destiny, or whether we want to use the resources at our disposal to stop the spread of and remove the Nicaraguan Communist cancer from our hemisphere. As a Democrat and as an American, I have always believed that we must shape our own destiny if we are to remain a free people.

I have heard many arguments against the proposed $100 million in aid for the Contras. I recognize that there is validity in arguments that aid needs to be properly audited, and that there needs to be greater coordination between the various Contra factions. The Contras need military training and they need defensive weapons. We need time sensitive negotiations to pursue our objectives diplomatically. The Skelton package addresses all these issues and we have been assured by the President, in word and deed, that these proposals are being considered in the formulation of a new game plan for Central America.

As in all insurgencies, there have been far too many brutalities, just as there were in our American Revolution. I'm sure my colleagues from Massachusetts could elaborate on those instances when individuals loyal to the British Crown were tarred and feathered and often hung on the Boston Commons. Our Nation must plan an active role in increasing the democratic nature of the Contra movement. There are differences over how we are to best do it. However these differences and this issue are peripheral. The fundamental question is whether we can tolerate the existence of another Communist state in our hemisphere.

Rejection of the $100 million aid package and adoption of a policy of inaction, with vague promises of a future vote on a compromise proposal, poses unacceptably grave risks for our Nation and other democracies. The risks are clear because there can be little doubt as to Sandinista intentions. The Sandinista Commandante Bayardo Arce makes clear the Sandinista contempt for democracy, pluralism and their plans to strengthen ties with the Soviets in the following remarks:

> The power to act is precisely what constitutes the essence of the dictatorship of the proletariat—the ability of the (working) class to impose its will by using the means at hand (without) (middle class) formalities. For us, then, the elections, viewed from that perspective, are a nuisance, just as a number of things that make up the reality of our revolution are a nuisance . . . It is useful for example, to be able to display an entrepreneurial class and mixed production in the mixed economy system we promulgated, while we move ahead in strategic ways. The important thing is that the entrepreneurial class no longer controls all the means to reproduce itself. It no longer controls the banks, foreign trade, or the source of foreign exchange. Therefore, any investment project in the country belongs to the State. The (middle class) no longer invests—it subsists . . . Imperialism (U.S.A.) asks three things of us: to abandon interventionism, to abandon strategic ties with the Soviet Union and the socialist community, and to be democratic. We cannot cease being internationalists unless we cease being revolutionaries. We cannot discontinue strategic relationships unless we cease being revolutionaries. It is impossible even to consider this.

These remarks and numerous other statements, and more importantly, actions of the Sandinista regime, make it clear that their objective is the establishment of a totalitarian Leninist state and the spread of their ideology throughout the region. Clearly both of these objectives are directly counter to U.S. interests. Sandinista success might well produce a flood of refugees into this country and lead to a reappraisal of many of our global commitments. If we remain passive in the face of the activist, aggressive policies of the Communists, we will allow them to determine the future of this region.

Central America is a pressure cooker about to explode. We cannot allow the Sandinistas to turn up the flames and bring disaster for the peoples of the region and our Nation. In this Chamber are two pictures. One of Washington, our first President and commander of the Revolutionary Armies, and one of Lafayette, the Frenchman who provided the needed military assistance that permitted our forces to triumph over British tyranny. Today Nicaraguans are asking for our assistance in ending Communist tyranny.

We must follow the example of Lafayette and provide the people of Nicaragua with assistance to put out the flame of Communist dictatorship. With our help the people of Nicaragua, Costa Rica and the emerging democracies in the region have a chance for a future in freedom. Freedom is a precious commodity for us, and it should be shared with our neighbors. I urge my colleagues to vote for aid to the Contras. Vote to help our friends. Vote to release these funds. Vote for freedom for the Nicaraguan people.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HEFNER] for the purpose of engaging in a colloquy with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STENHOLM].

Mr. HEFNER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a couple of questions because my concern is the fact that the $100 million we have got kind of oversimplified and a lot of folks have the idea that $100 million, then all our problems are gone.

The gentleman alluded to the fact in his opening statement that we should support the $100 million to do away with the Sandinista government in Nicaragua. If that is the goal, to me I have a problem figuring out where do we go after the $100 million. The gentleman also mentioned that we have to come back, we would have to have support of gunships and sophisticated weapons and this sort of thing. Is the gentleman talking about coming back at a later date with an appropriation or legislation that would give more moneys, appropriate moneys for helicopters and what have you? That is a problem that I have had with this legislation all along. To me $100 million, I know what $100 million buys and I know that $100 million does not do anything as far as would even be enough to sustain for 1 year let alone 18 months and would buy any weapons in time. Would the gentleman comment on what he meant when he said he is going to come back?

□ 1725

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would be happy to.

The gentleman's crystal ball is much clearer than mine when he can foresee what may or may not happen in the future.

What I was referring to in my statement is what we know is a fact there today. We know that the Contras, those Nicaraguan people who want to fight communism within their country and deliver their country back, need help.

Last year, the wisdom of this House said $27 million in humanitarian aid was enough to do it. Clearly that has not been enough to do anything. Whether $100 million will be enough or whether it is $50 million or whatever.

Mr. HEFNER. I am not being argumentative, and I do not have a crystal ball, but I know what things cost.

What I am asking is, the gentleman said that they were going to have to have more arms and this sort of thing; do you say that we are going to have to come back for another appropriation or another resolution for more money? That is all that I am asking.

Mr. STENHOLM. I have heard statement after statement made by Members on this side of the aisle, and there is not a doubt in my mind that there is an overwhelming majority of this House of Representatives, both sides of the aisle, who are prepared to vote those funds necessary to stop communism in that hemisphere.

What we are talking about today is a new and revised game plan for achieving that.

The idea of $100 million being something magic, I share the gentleman's concern about that, and do not begin to suggest that is a magic number. What we are talking about is a game plan to be funded. I believe that this amount of money can fund this new and revised game plan to begin helping the situation in Central America.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Chairman, reclaiming my time, the problem that I have with it is the lack of policy. It is $100 million and that is it. It is $100 million, and it supposedly is going to stop the spread of communism, and we will have no more problems. I have real problems with this.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 11 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS].

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for yielding me this time.

Members of the body, I would like to first state that this 10-hour limitation of the debate clearly expedites the business of this body, but it in no way stimulates a healthy debate on the floor of this Congress. We all know that. The best that it does is put it in the position of haranguing each other at a very adolescent level. And while 10 hours allows us within a reasonably short period of time to go forward on the debate, there is no opportunity for dialog and debate; all we can ostensibly do is harass each other: "Will the gentleman yield? Will the gentlewoman yield?" And it does not allow us to engage each other in a very honest and a very healthy way.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I would like to say that in the remaining time that I have, this gentleman seeks to assert my political position, to state my concerns and, with whatever time that I have remaining, I would like very much to try to yield so that we can engage in some healthy and honest debate. Let me now proceed to stating my political position, Mr. Chairman.

Let us not fool ourselves about the reasons for this aid and the so-called secret war against Nicaragua. At various times, the Contra leadership has declared the real reasons for the secret war against Nicaragua. The Contras and this administration and many of my colleagues in this Chamber have abandoned all pretext for using aid to the Contras for the purposes of interdicting arms supplies to El Salvador. It is very clear what the purpose of this aid is about. It is for the overthrow of the Sandinista government. The Government of this Nation knows that and still supports the paramilitary operation.

For example, Mr. Chairman, Colonel Bermudez, the Contra commander, declared in 1984, that:

> It is not acceptable to carry out missions to interdict Cuban and Russian supply lines to El Salvador. We are Nicaraguans and our objective is to overthrow the Communists.

The undeclared war against the Government and the people of Nicaragua is contrary to the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Chairman, violating the right of this body, the Congress, to declare war. And I would assert further that it is also in violation of the rule of law. There is a statute on the books known as the Neutrality Act. I believe that aid to the Contras is in direct violation of the rule of law. It clearly contravenes the charter of the Organization of American States. Here I have very specific reference to article 15 of the Organization of American States.

I would assert further that it is not only my opinion, but the opinion of many others, that we are also in violation of U.S. international obligations including the charter of the United Nations.

Mr. Chairman, what kind of people are the Contras, these so-called moral equivalents of the Founding Fathers? Here I allude to a statement made by the President of the United States.

Their activities have been documented by America's Watch, the New York Times, CBS News, the Washington Office on Latin America, the International Human Rights Law Group, and many independent observers, including Washington Post writer Chris Dickey.

The Washington Office on Latin America report issued in February and compiled by Ms. Mary Dutcher, a former assistant attorney general for the State of Missouri, synthesizes the multiple findings as follows:

> The preponderance of evidence indicates that the continuation of a systematic pattern of gross violations committed by Contra forces * * * the presence of Contra troops in a given locale seemed to rise to a pattern of indiscriminate attacks against civilian targets, kidnapings, rapes, assassinations, mutilations and other forms of violations.

Edgar Chamorro, former member of the Contra directorate, affirmed this statement when he said:

The atrocities I had heard about were not isolated incidents, but reflected a consistent pattern of behavior by our troops.

Mr. Chairman, we should not be suprised by the activities of the Contras. We have seen their key military and civilian leadership before. I quote from an article by James Lemoyne on March 24, 1985, New York Times:

While their foot soldiers are mainly peasants, angered by Sandinista policies, almost all the top commanders are from former national guard officers * * *.

And further:

Their supreme military commander, Col. Enrique Bermudez, was the Somoza government's last military attache in Washington.

And further:

Their numbers may be small, but their influence appears to be great. Under Colonel Bermudez, the heads of logistics, intelligence, training, operations, special forces and most of the largest combat units are guard veterans. Many company commanders are influential national guard enlisted men. And two influential rebel civilian officials, the brothers Sanchez, were large landowners who backed the Somoza regime.

And finally, Mr. Chairman:

Worried about the guardsmen's reputations, the CIA appointed a new seven-member national directorate to meet journalists and Congressman. Colonel Bermudez and his aides continued to run the military.

A movement committed to democracy, Mr. Chairman, cannot arise out of this fabric of oppression. The military adventures of the Contras are not going to achieve a military success. Outside observers hold that the major effect of the effort is serving to turn the Sandinista army into a more effective fighting unit.

And if the fighting will not bring victory, Mr. Chairman, it certainly will not bring peace. Violence is not the way to a resolution of the problems in Nicaragua.

The Contadora nations have been trying desperately to find a basis for a peaceful settlement of the fighting in Nicaragua and elsewhere in Central America. The United States has not—I repeat, has not—facilitated this process. The Contadora process is dead in the water because of our recalcitrance.

I repeat for the purposes of emphasis, Mr. Chairman, our intransigence.

A change of policy is needed. Let us commit ourselves to true multilateral negotiations. It is either negotiations or an unacceptable war.

The administration has not been able to explain satisfactorily in 3 years, Mr. Chairman, what the Contras are to achieve and how it is to be done.

The present policy besides violating international laws, violates our traditional values. Outside of Central America, we have no support.

I would assert at this point in the RECORD, Mr. Chairman, that our relationship with the Contras is illegal.

□ 1735

Our relationship at this time with the Contras is immoral. I would assert that at this point our relationship with the Contras is insane.

Mr. Chairman, the politics of the cold war, which has masqueraded as American foreign policy for over 40 years, only states what we stand against. It does not state what we stand for. And, Mr. Chairman, I have tried to state over and over that if you disagree with an idea, and if that idea is communism, then how do you fight it? With a bigger bomb or bigger missile or bigger bullet or $100 million in aid to the Contras? Or do you stand up and say to the world, "We have a better idea". And if that better idea is a commitment to democratic policies and principles, we are not doing a good job of that.

We have a constitutional form of government. Our Constitution says we declare war, we do not use funds though Contras and the President of the United States.

If a better idea is a rule of law, we are not operating within the rule of law. If it is a respect for international law and a dedication to the orderly processes of dialog and debate, we are not doing a good job of it. If it is a commitment to a political solution and the embracing of the magnificence of the value of peace and the understanding and the recognition of the magnificence of the human spirit, we are not doing a good job of it. If our better idea is a commitment to human development and social justice, we are not doing a good job of it.

Mr. Chairman, if that better idea cannot be asserted from these Chambers, where can it be asserted from? From what better place than in this hemisphere can we show a commitment to dialog and democratic principles and political solutions.

What better time than now to embrace these ideas? War and death and destruction is not a way to go forward into the 21st century. We have to stop this madness. Even if you oppose communism in the strongest of terms, then what do you fight it with? With democracy, with the rule of law, with the understanding and respect for human life and human dignity and social justice. You do not do it with aid to the Contras, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am reminded of a gentleman that I think the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] respects, whom we have helped in Central America, Mr. Duarte. We could not have helped that fragile democracy to survive if we had not given him the military aid that he needed as a shield to protect that democracy. The idea of having two legs of a triad without having military help has not worked in Central America. Where we have given the military help, those fragile democracies have persevered, they have prevailed.

Mr. DELLUMS. If I might reclaim my time, I simply say to my colleague that I do not believe that is a wave of the future. War is an anachronism. It seems to me we have to come to grips with that.

I think the best thing that America can export to the world is a commitment to democratic principles, not a commitment to violence, to death and destruction. That is all this proposition gives us on the floor of this Congress. When we say, "Fight a proxy war," that is not a commitment to peace and democratic principles. That is all I am trying to assert to my colleagues.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5½ minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, many of the people who have been speaking against assistance to the Contras talk about the need to negotiate first. Well, we have tried to negotiate. The roadblocks to negotiations have come not from the United States but from the Sandinistas. When the Sandinistas have negotiated, they have negotiated for their own purposes, and whether the Sandinistas have negotiated or refused to negotiate, they have promoted subversion and aggression throughout all of Central America.

A former Sandinista intelligence officer, Miguel Bolanos, who defected from Nicaragua in May 1983, described the Sandinista policy this way. He said:

We wanted dialogue, the strategy is that we are willing to dialogue to allow more time for clandestine operation, especially with the United States with dialogue, there is more political space that is advantageous to Nicaragua * * *but dialogue is more a political tool than anything else; you can use it as a cover.

Let us look at the history of dialog.

Between August and October 1981—United States initiates diplomatic exchanges with Nicaragua. We offer a bilateral nonaggression treaty, economic assistance, and our influence to encourage Nicaraguan exiles in the United States to moderate their behavior if Nicaragua stops helping Salvadoran guerrillas, and limits its military buildup.

Nicaragua rejects the offer.

In October, Salvadoran guerrillas, trained in Nicaragua, attack the Puente de Oro bridge in El Salvador.

On November 17, after we tried to start talks, the Honduran police staged a raid on a guerrilla safe house in Tegulcigalpa and found evidence that the Honduran Front for Popular Liberation was receiving its funds from Nicaragua.

In January, 1982, guerrillas trained in Nicaragua attacked Ilopongo airbase in Honduras.

April 9, 1982, the United States offered an 8-point proposal to Nicaragua.

On October 4, 1982, in Costa Rica, seven democratic governments, including the United States, signed the Declaration of San Jose, outlining a regional peace settlement. Nicaragua turned down the plan.

On July 4, 1982, guerrilla forces in Honduras, trained in Nicaragua, sabotaged the main power station in Tegulcigalpa.

In April, 1983, Nicaraguan Interior Minister Tomas Borge says in an interview for Cuban television that Nicaragua will not negotiate about the situation in Central America and will not talk with or about the counter-revolutionaries.

April 27, 1983, President Reagan appointed a special envoy, Richard Stone, to facilitate dialog in El Salvador and Nicaragua.

July 21, 1983, Costa Rica, Guatemala, and Honduras propose a peace plan. Nicaragua does not respond.

In July, a large armed force crossed into Olancho Department in eastern Honduras. The weapons are provided by the Sandinistas.

July 23, 1983, President Reagan delivered a letter to the Contadora group presidents, supporting Contadora principles.

September 9, 1983, the Contadora document of objectives is approved by five Central American countries.

In October, an FMLN guerrilla defects, and he says that up to 50 tons of arms and ammunition are being delivered every 3 months from Nicaragua to Salvadoran guerrillas.

On December 30, the fourth brigade headquarters in El Salvador is attacked; the mockup of the headquarters used for that attack was built in Cuba and the weapons came from Nicaragua.

Between March and June 1984, 100 members of the Revolutionary People's Army in El Salvador receive training in Nicaragua.

June 1, 1984, Secretary Shultz visits Managus to launch bilateral talks in support of the Contadora agreement.

Between June and December 1984, the United States and Nicaragua have nine rounds of bilateral talks at Manzanillo, Mexico. The United States offers a peace assurance in return for Nicaraguan acceptance of modifications to the September 7 Contadora agreement.

December 10, Nicaragua totally rejects the United States proposal and proposes to scrap the entire Contadora process.

At the same time, Nicaragua receives shipment of the Soviets' most sophisticated gunship, the Hind MI-24.

On April 4, 1985, President Reagan calls on Nicaragua to accept dialog and he asks the Contras to keep their March 1 peace offer open.

Nicaragua refuses to respond.

April 11, 1985, the Contadora group agrees in principle on revised verification procedures.

April 25, Ortega flies to Moscow for his ninth visit.

July 26, 1985, Secretary Shultz states our willingness to resume bilateral talks if Sandinistas move toward internal dialog in Nicaragua.

There was no response.

October 15, Ortega announces a new state of emergency, suspending virtually all civil liberties.

October 29, Nicaragua totally rejects the San Jose peace proposal.

December 3, Nicaragua asks for complete suspension of Contadora talks.

December 9, 1985, OAS General Assembly votes 28 to 1 toward continuation of the Contadora talks. Only Nicaragua votes "no".

January 1, 1986, Catholic radio station is closed by Sandinistas.

February, Nicaragua repeats objections to Contadora agreement in Ortega's speech to Third Cuban Communist Party Congress in Cuba.

February 6, 1986, opposition parties in Nicaragua propose suspension of hostilities. Nicaragua rejects the proposal and Sandinista delegation flies to Moscow to attend the Soviet Communist Party Congress.

Every other leader of Central America has agreed to say, "We will talk with our guerrillas, if you, Mr. Ortega, talk to yours." But Daniel Ortega won't. He will not risk what all other leaders in Central America have had the courage and conviction to do: To ask the people themselves who they want to run their country, and what kind of system they believe would be best for their country.

If Mr. Ortega really wants to see the opposition to his government disappear, and if he really wants the United States to accept his government, he will talk.

Let no one hide behind the argument that we cannot send military help, but that we need to talk. We are talking, but the Sandinistas will not talk. We need military assistance to force them to the bargaining table.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING].

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, the most disturbing thing to me about this issue, as posed by the President's approach, is his utter failure to recognize that there is any other reasonable alternative other than the one he has chosen. And the one he has chosen is appropriately characterized as all stick and no carrot. It is simply mind-boggling that the Nation that produced the Marshall Plan, produced NATO, has done all of the constructive things that saved Western Europe after the war and democratized Japan, can now not seem to think of anything but a military approach to solving what is basically a social, economic, and political problem.

Clearly, there are constructive alternatives. The Democratic caucus task force, under the chairmanship of our colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE], has produced an absolutely outstanding set of recommendations, which I commend to every Member and which has been distributed to every member of the caucus and I am sure will be available to the gentlemen on the other side if they would like to have it.

The people of the country are overwhelmingly opposed to military involvement in Nicaragua. Telephone calls in my Akron office, after the President's speech, were 2 to 1 against the President's position, even though he asked people to call in to support his position. The people have learned from their sad experience of 20 years and over 50,000 dead Americans in Vietnam to avoid military involvement in other nations' civil wars.

The nations of Central America, those most closely affected, are against the President. The leadership of the four largest South American democracies have just come out against military aid to the Contras. Yet the President insists that he knows the answers and everyone else is wrong. Worse yet, he impugns the patriotism of anyone who dares to differ with him.

I spent 4 years in the U.S. Army in World War II, 3 of them overseas. I think I am a freedom fighter. I think that it is a slur on the memory of the Founders of this country, the Revolutionary heroes who died and suffered at Valley Forge, to compare this gang running the Contras to our patriots throughout our history.

Let me just read you a couple of things about them. A recent study by the Congressional Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus states that 12 of the 13 members of the Contra's leadership are today, as they have been since 1980, former officers in Somoza's National Guard.

The supreme commander, Col. Enrique Bermudez, was one of the most senior officers in Somoza's National Guard.

Capt. Armando "El Policia" Lopez, the commander of logistics, is one of Bermudez's closest associates "and is considered by a number of our sources to be his principal military adviser. Lopez acquired his nickname, "El Policia," under Somoza, when he commanded units of Managua's metropolitan police, a branch of the National Guard.

"El Policia" is controversial both because of his brutal behavior toward FDN prisoners * * * and because of his prior service with the Managua police, which Somoza used to arrest hundreds of civilian political opponents. By the late 1970's, international human rights organizations reported substantial numbers of tortures and assassinations by the Managua police.

The chief of special operations for Honduras, Maj. Ricardo Lau, is the most controversial member of the FDN High Command, is a close associate of Bermudez. Caucus sources confirm numerous press accounts of his brutal and criminal behavior both during his Guard service and his tenure with the 15th of September Legion and the FDN.

Lau attained the rank of major in the National Guard—he arranged for hundreds of political arrests and at times supervised or approved clandestine torture and execution.

These are freedom fighters? These are people to be compared with patriots of our revolution and past wars? Shame, shame on the President for saying that he is a Contra. I hope he realizes that he has made an allusion which is beneath him. The President is not a Contra. He is indeed a patriot and one who stands high in the annals of civilized thinking. We must believe that he did not realize the implications of what he was saying.

Mr. Chairman, the administration's approach will lead to a dead end in every sense of the word. The alternative is to engage in serious negotiations, support the efforts of the Contadora group, and develop some constructive programs to deal with the economic, social, and political backwardness of Central America. We should even offer to help Nicaragua, if it will respect basic human rights and the integrity of its neighbor states.

□ 1750

Mr. Chairman, I am including for the RECORD at this point an editorial from the Akron Beacon Journal of March 18, 1986, and an editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of March 18, 1986, both of which strongly support the kind of approach I have suggested.

DIPLOMACY WOULD SERVE UNITED STATES BEST IN NICARAGUA

President Reagan is so vehement in insisting that Nicaragua's Sandinista government is a direct threat to American security that even his opponents must occasionally wonder: What if he's right? What if he knows something we don't?

The answer is that even if this worst case proved true, Mr. Reagan's request for $100 million to aid "contra" rebels is still misplaced. If the threat is as bad as he says it is, $100 million would not begin to do the job. In that case Mr. Reagan should be prepared to commit U.S. troops and have the political courage to sell that idea to the American people.

But the evidence shows that Mr. Reagan has overstated the threat. In his televised speech Sunday night, the President left no connection unmade. He linked the Sandinistas to illicit drug traffic and suggested Nicaragua has become a "Soviet beachhead" and an outpost for the PLO, Ayatollah Khomeini and Red Brigade terrorists; he said this "mounting danger" would spead through the hemisphere and played on fears that a wave of Latin refugees would wash upon U.S. shores.

By all unbiased accounts, this gives Nicaragua too much credit. But even Mr. Reagan's congressional opponents will concede the fact that the Sandinistas are a shabby little regime that represses its people and would subvert its neighbors if it had the power. The argument, made Sunday night by Sen. James Sasser, D-Tenn., is how best to achieve the goals of promoting human rights in Nicaragua and peace in Central America.

Mr. Reagan's own intelligence agencies say the contras can't win. They have little popular support within Nicaragua and, in fact, contra operations—not to mention atrocities—allow the Sandinistas to plead justification for more repression and more Soviet aid. Sandinista forces appear stronger than ever and Mr. Reagan has admitted he will probably be back for more aid in 18 months.

This approach promises only more turmoil in Central America, which can only make the United States more hated as an interventionist. And it neglects the role of the prime players—the other Central American nations that oppose contra aid and have urged the United States to negotiate a peaceful settlement. Mr. Reagan says he has tried negotiations. But he has never seen the peace initiatives from the perspective of the Latin Americans, who fear U.S. involvement as much as communism in Nicaragua. If the United States encourages war there without first exhausting the peace process, U.S. prestige may never recover.

A word should also be said about Mr. Reagan's heavy-handed tactics in dealing with Congress on this issue. He claims he wants a bipartisan foreign policy, yet Mr. Reagan and his lieutenants have promised to brand as un-American anyone who opposes their aid to rebel guerrillas.

The President may yet win this fight in Congress. But contra aid alone is not an enlightened policy for the complexities of Central America. It might make trouble for one nasty government, but at the expense of Washington's reputation among democratic nations of the region and the world. And it puts American taxpayers in the position of keeping alive a guerrilla war that has turned ugly.

Diplomacy could also fail. But it has a chance and it would put the United States in league with its Latin allies who want to isolate the Sandinistas and turn back their subversion.

THE COLOR RED

Leaders of Nicaragua's government are so underwhelmed by the contra-aid debate in the United States that the Sandinista president took his family on a "working" vacation to Cuba, The New York Times has reported. Daniel Ortega, the cocky leader of the Managua revolution, knows better than anyone else that he will not be driven to the negotiating table if the loose-knit band of contra-revolutionaries fighting him is given $100 million by the country that founded their movement.

The Reagan administration's aid proposal cannot achieve the president's aims, but that is not the worst element of the current debate. More upsetting is the shrillness of the administration's words. Rather than leading to a thoughtful discussion of foreign policy objectives, the discussion has plunged Congress into a battle over who can appear most committed to democracy, with opponents of the president feeling forced to reaffirm their patriotism, lest they be branded as commie-lovers.

What started four years ago as an effort to head off the arming of anti-government guerrillas in El Salvador has become an intense public relations campaign featuring maps of Latin America, symbolically splotched with the color red to illustrate a perceived Communist threat to much of the hemisphere. As each day passes before Thursday's House vote, we are told of new, startling evidence but are provided few actual details of further Soviet/Cuban/ Nicaraguan outrages. It's as if yesterday's story wasn't good enough, so something new must be provided to capture a reluctant public's imagination. The president Sunday night went beyond his listing of huge Soviet airfields, which have yet to be built, to bring Mu'ammar Qadhafi, Yasser Arafat and the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini into the long list of menaces the United States faces in a tiny country three nations away.

If the threat to democracy is so real, why fool around with a mere $30 million worth of medicine, food and trucks and another $70 million in boots, bullets and anti-aircraft missiles for a band of rogues that offers no guarantee of bringing about the intended result? Why not send in the Marines?

Because the threat does not exist to the extent that the president claims. The Sandinistas are untrustworthy engineers of an unsavory social revolution. But they rule over just three million people in a tiny country sandwiched between two Central American democracies. They can be contained through diplomatic and economic pressure on them and their sponsors, coupled with economic support of democratic governments in the region and strong notice that the presence of advanced weapons or foreign troops on Nicaraguan soil will not be tolerated by the United States.

The president, by repeatedly referring to the contras as a "democratic resistance" movement Sunday night, gave the rebels a label they do not deserve. The contras are not a united force. More than one fourth of their leadership is made up of former members of the fallen Somoza government's hated national guard. They adhere to human right's principles no more so than does the government they seek to replace.

Even some supporters of the administration's position recognize those aspects of the contras. But they say Nicaragua offers only bad choices, and that the proper U.S. approach is to pick the best of the bad—the contras. That presumes, however, that the contras can succeed. Were they that strong, Daniel Ortega wouldn't be vacationing in Havana this week.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEWINE].

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this debate now I guess all afternoon and the one thing that strikes me is that my colleagues on this side of the aisle who oppose the aid really do not have an alternative. We have heard the reasons for not giving the aid, but there is no coherent policy coming out as an alternative.

Mr. Chairman, we have a policy. Our policy is what the gentleman from Illinois, HENRY HYDE, a few hours ago said was a triad policy. No one says that the Communists are going to be thrown out of Nicaragua purely by military force; neither was Somoza.

If you read Shirley Christian's book about Nicaragua in the 1979 revolution, what you find is he was toppled by a combination of economic, military, and political force. That is what we are talking about.

We have a viable alternative. I just heard my friend on the other side of the aisle say, "Well, what about negotiations?" That is what we always hear.

The gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. MICKEY EDWARDS, just detailed the attempts at negotiations by this country. I only have one thing to add to that sorry story of futility that we have now been able to get them to negotiate, and that is this. Is there anybody in this Chamber who can give me one example of a Communist government that has ever negotiated themselves out of power, or better yet, can they give me one example of a Communist country that has ever shared power? None. There is absolutely none.

What we are asking for is the military pressure to force them to negoitate.

Now, some of my friends on the other side of the aisle also say that if it is so bad, if it is so horrible, then why does not the President send in the Marines, send in the Army.

Is that really your policy? Is it so bad that we are faced with another Cuba, another Vietnam? Is there no middle ground, no alternative? I say there is. There is middle alternative and that is the President's proposal of military aid, coupled with the other forces coming together. There is a middle ground.

My next door neighbor when I was home a few weeks ago asked me, she said, "Mike, why do you go to Central America?" She said, "Why am I always reading about that? Why do you care about that region of the world?"

My answer to her was this. I care about it and I believe we should send aid down there and your tax dollars, because I do not want my children fighting down there and I do not want her grandchildren fighting down there. That is why. That is what the choice is. We have a viable alternative.

I appeal to this body, the party of Harry Truman, the party of John F. Kennedy, the party that has historically understood that you cannot be an isolationist country, that you save lives by looking forward. Look forward. Save our sons from going to Central America, support this proposal.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS].

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, this has been the most important foreign policy issue that this administration has chosen to debate, arms to fight, an impoverished, poor, tiny country in Central America. The arguments have been rather incredible. But hysteria has been rather mild, considering how high we can go on the Richter Scale of hysteria. I am very proud of the House so far. Somehow we have managed to contain our deep emotions on the subject. No one has been called a Communist in several hours.

I have been following this. I was talking to my good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], to whom I am not going to yield, and he told me about the Nicaraguan out in the chambers who had both ears cut off by the Sandinistas and he urged me to visit him and I went out there. He was not there. He probably will be back tomorrow, so I will have a good chance to talk with him. I hope that influences my vote somewhat.

We read now today that this great organization called the National Endowment for Democracy is now funding through its support groups—you know, the ones we voted to keep out of politics. Their proxy organizations are now running ads in America to advise us how to vote on tomorrow's pending measure.

I have seen a lot of photos and maps out in the hall. That means for all of you Congress watchers that this is an important measure. When we get maps and charts and photos, it is heavy duty around here, Mister, but there is one map I have not seen. I have not seen the map that draws the way that the Nicaraguan army is going to infiltrate to Harlingen, TX, in 2 days time. That map has not been produced yet but maybe it will come. It would have to show them going from Nicaragua through four nations. The terrain, I have been advised, is a little difficult, but I am not worried, Mr. President, because I know at the borders they will be stopped by Customs, the INS, the DEA, and the Coast Guard, so there for all these Nicaraguan invaders, 2 days away from Harlingen, TX.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONYERS. I absolutely cannot.

For all of you who are worried about that, you will not see one chart on that subject.

I have listened to a lot of explanations about this poor country and I will hear some more tomorrow during 2 more hours of debate. But one thing needs to be explained to me. If this is a Communist country, if this country is ruled by a Marxist-Leninist government, why is 60 percent of the economy in private hands and why was American business the largest trading partner with Nicaragua before the embargo?

Will somebody please tell me that—and not on my time.

So I want to close my 5 minutes by saying that we need not be Contras or not Contras to vote on this. Nobody here is a Contra. You do not even need to be a freedom fighter. You do not even have to have served in the armed services, although it helps.

Believe me, I feel sorry for all the Members of Congress who have not served in the military and have not been in combat. They are a little bit disabled in this kind of battle, because this debate is primarily reserved for the people who have really served their country. You are not serving your country if you are just in the Congress. You must have been not only in the military, but in action; so for all of you who haven't, feel free to revise and extend.

We have behaved ourselves very admirably so far. I think the vote is just about in. There may be one Member floating around here with an unmade up mind, and I am looking for him just as hard as you are.

□ 1800

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4½ minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA].

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, it is pretty difficult to follow the act of the gentleman from Michigan, but I will try.

I will vote for the President's request for military and economic aid for the Nicaraguan Contras. I take this position only after serious study of the facts as they can be ascertained.

This is not an easy decision to make. The so-called facts as claimed by the strong partisans on opposite sides of the issue are not hard facts at all. The overblown rhetoric has obscured the central issues and raised emotions when the seriousness of the problem demands clearheaded analysis.

Indeed, partisans on either side have tried to mobilize majority opinion among the people. The result of their efforts has been polarization. Meanwhile, the uncommitted majority of Americans remain confused and unconvinced.

The time is now, my colleagues, to make reasoned judgment. And there are some certainties, certainties that have led me to conclude that this military assistance would be appropriate leverage at this time.

Certainty 1: The good guys and the bad guys cannot be easily identified. But all parties agree that the Sandinistas are "bad actors." They have abandoned their original revolution, become increasingly repressive and have moved to destabilize the region. Even the Democratic response to the President's appeal to the American people cited "We agree that the Sandinista government has betrayed the promise of its own revolution, has supressed the freedom of its own people, and has supported subversion against its neighbor El Salvador."

Certainty 2: The facts of geography are compelling. The threat of insurgency and the continuing export of arms and revolution in our hemisphere by the Sandinista government is acknowledged even by the President's more severe critics.

Certainty 3: The situation has deteriorated. Negotiations have not been successful. Contadora, which still holds promise, has not moved forward, for whatever reasons. Nevertheless, I have concluded that Secretary of State George Shultz makes a valid case when he asserts that an incentive is needed to promote negotiations and that the diplomatic option is not foreclosed. The appointment of Philip Habib as Special Envoy to Central America is tangible evidence that we are pursuing diplomatic efforts. However, under present conditions, there is no incentive to negotiate.

Negotiations, it should be stressed, does not mean an overthrow of the Sandinista government. Negotiations should be conducted in the context of Contadora principles:

Ending support for armed insurgencies and arms trafficking in Central America.

Ending the foreign military presence in the region, and Developing central American economies through mutual efforts and regional economic integration.

Our goal should be a Nicaragua contained and no longer a threat to its democratic neighbors, and in return their right to self-determination. My friends, the threat of Communist insurgency in Central America and indeed, throughout Latin America, is fed by the long history of brutal repression of the people by landed wealthy oligarchies and military juntas that have led people into grinding poverty.

In summary, approving this aid package now is a necessary action toward defining a policy. That policy should be, as Mr. Shultz has pledged, a negotiated settlement.

But the real needs of our Latin neighbors must also be addressed: Land Reform, economic aid and long-term development assistance. In short, a new good neighbor policy for the decade.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my concern in regard to House Joint Resolution 540, which if passed would provide $100 million to the Contra freedom fighters.

I have noticed that various individuals and publications are characterizing the debate as one between the liberals and the conservatives.

I want to say at the outset of my remarks that I have fully supported all prior covert, overt, and other types of aid approved to combat the frightening situation which is going on in Central America.

In fact, my voting record lines up with the President's views and philosophies at approximately 66 percent—one of the highest among my Democratic colleagues.

I am fully aware of the serious threat that we face, if the Communists increase their hold on Central America and spread into neighboring countries.

We do indeed face a serious dilemma. For instance, we have no assurance that the so-called Contra freedom fighters will ever be able to gain a foothold or even the confidence of the Nicaraguan people.

History points out that guerrilla armies are not created overnight.

The Nicaraguan Sandinista FSLN fought for 18 years before becoming organized well enough to overthrow the Somoza regime.

The Vietnamese and Chinese fought for more than a decade before creating effective guerrilla armies.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would submit to you that this proposal of $100 million is hardly even a smidgen, as compared to what we face in the way of continued aid that will be needed to protect our investment in the Contras, which, by the way, already exceeds $100 million in prior aid.

If this sounds somewhat familiar, I would invite you to check the history of how we became involved in the Vietnam conflict to the tune of 50,000 American lives and billions of dollars.

On the other hand, we must realize that if we vote down the $100 million in aid, we are taking a risk that Nicaragua and eventually Central America, and Mexico may all be consolidated into a Soviet-backed Sandinista regime.

So, is this a stroke in time to save nine—or will we be shooting ourselves in the foot? Or is there some other way out of this dilemma?

This background brings me to my point of concern which I want to address at this time.

We are informed by reliable sources that there are six opposition groups totaling about 20,000 so-called Contras.

The United States has chosen to support one of the six, known as the FDN, or the Nicaraguan Democratic Force.

The FDN was created by the Argentine military and security agents with the assistance of the American CIA.

The FDN high command upon formation, without exception, was drawn entirely from the Somoza national guard. They claim, however, that 40 percent of their troops are former Sandinista soldiers and that presently less than 2 percent are former national guardsmen.

The group consists of about 12,000 insurgents. It is reported that there is much unhappiness with current CIA-imposed leadership and that commanders in the field fully share their troops' resentment of the FDN's leadership.

The FDN's recent reversals and their weakness result from a lack of combat officers, as well as equipment. It is reported that they are poorly trained. They have shown little interest in recruiting educated and urban cadres who tend to or might have political differences with some of the FDN leadership.

My reservations to supporting House Joint Resolution 540 are because of these confirmed problems that I know exist. They are coupled with my shock and dismay to learn just a few weeks ago that $27 million in humanitarian aid, approved with considerable effort by myself and others of my colleagues, took 7 months to trickle down. The GAO further reports that approximately $10 million of the total package cannot be accounted for.

Neither the administration nor DOD felt that it was necessary or important enough to notify their congressional supporters of this problem, thereby causing me and some of my friends personal embarrassment, who sweated some blood to get that humanitarian aid passed.

One must assume that if we do not have the ability to distribute boots, clothing and food, and other humanitarian goods, it will be unlikely that $100 million in cash can be channeled into the right area, without at least a portion of it ending up in Swiss bank accounts.

Who will buy the weapons and where will they be bought, from what country?

What involvement will American advisers play in an overt or covert manner?

The $100 million has already been reprogrammed from military ammunition and other accounts, and Secretary Weinberger in a committee hearing made it clear that this would have to be authorized in 1987—new money back to the DOD.

And finally, I'm concerned about America's own threat from within, the threat which has been forecast by Soviet prophecies of fiscal irresponsibility and the ruin of our financial system, which could carry this great Nation down.

It takes the debt and the deficit and Gramm-Rudman-Hollings very seriously.

There cannot be a viable national defense without viable economic security. We do not have viable economic security and we face considerable risk in investing $100 million in House Joint Resolution 540.

Mr. Chairman, we do need a third alternative which I am unable to recommend. But, I do have some very strong reservations about passing the present plan, which I believe to be very strongly flawed.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAY] yields back 1 minute.

□ 1810

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Nevada [Mrs. VUCANOVICH].

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, fellow Members of the House, tomorrow we are going to cast a vote that is far more important than many had previously realized—and it will likely be one of the most important votes many of us will cast in our entire service in Congress, for the issue before us is, without question, the gravest, most vital foreign policy question of this decade and the reverberations will be felt for generations to come. If the majority in this body decides to cast a negative vote, it will be our children and grandchildren who will look back and wonder why—how we could possibly have allowed such a situation to develop. They would be right in looking back, as we look back at Neville Chamberlain, and ask if we could really have been so blind?

It disturbs me that the proposal for $100 million in aid to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters has become so partisan, with personal prestige and power on the line rather than a focus on the real issue. The real issue is democracy. In 1979 we saw a nation of freedom-seeking individuals topple a dictatorship. The odds were against them, to be sure, but as our own history vividly shows, when man has a desire for freedom, though the road be long and filled with obstacles, with a little assistance he will prevail. We saw it happen. The Nicaraguan people brought down the Somoza regime. We watched in hope and anticipation as the Sandinistas led their fellow Nicaraguans and the free world to believe that they were going to establish the democracy the people had craved—the democracy many of their family and friends had died for—the democracy the Sandinistas had vowed to provide. What we now know, what has been so graphically demonstrated is that one dictatorship was brought down and another, more brutal dictatorship has taken its place. As lovers of liberty we should be deeply concerned that a revolution to depose a hated dictator has regressed into an even more tyrannical regime that we have even less power to moderate.

Hindsight is wonderful, and in this case we have a hindsight advantage. We can look back through modern history and we know without any question what will happen throughout Central America if we were to deny aid to the Nicaraguan resistance by voting down the President's request. Look at Poland, at Hungary, at Czechoslovakia, at Romania, at Cuba and Afghanistan—what have we learned from these and other captive nations about Communist totalitarian governments?

If nothing else, we have learned that the one thing they tell us that we can believe, is that they do intend to expand; they do intend to dominate the world. They have repeatedly told us, and they have repeatedly shown us that we can take them at their word on that promise. Can there be any doubt now that they mean what they say?

No, there is no longer any room for doubt. We do not have the luxury of spending time questioning their goals or motives for they have made their position very clear and have consistently lived up to their promise that they will someday control the world.

In a region of the world that is making amazing progress toward true democracy, the Sandinistas are committed to reversing this trend, to establish a Marxist-Leninist-Stalinist region—a hemisphere permanently aligned with the Soviet bloc. This must not be allowed to happen. If not in Nicaragua, where do we draw the line? How much of Central America do we allow to succumb to the claws of the Soviet Union before we can no longer ignore our responsibility—our responsibility to our neighbors, to our country, to our fellow man?

Our goal is simple—it is moral—it is legitimate. Our goal is to provide the Nicaraguan people with the right to self-determination. Their democratic revolution was betrayed by the Sandinistas. By going back on their promise of pluralism, the Nicaraguan Communists have forced the citizens of Nicaragua to fight again. The Sandinista repression in 1979, 1980, and 1981, destroyed any hope the citizens had that their cherished dream of democracy was achievable under the Sandinistas.

Just as some have tried to make this a partisan issue, others have tried to make it an either/or issue—either aid to the Contras or continue working within Contadora for a peaceful solution. Those of us committed to aiding the freedom fighters are just as adamantly supportive of negotiations. We want a political solution, but the Sandinistas give lip service to the concept of negotiating. When it suits their purposes, they go through the motions of pretending to be supportive of negotiating. However, in all this time, they have yet to negotiate, and have yet to live up to their initial agreement with their neighbors. Their record is one of repudiating their promises to the Organization of American States, and failing to show good faith in any negotiating attempts. But why should they? Why would they want to negotiate away their repressive power? Only when they are forced to negotiate will a political solution be possible; only when the pressure is intense will they be forced to negotiate, and only when there is a strong resistance will the pressure be intense enough to force the Sandinistas to the negotiating table, where we will be able to work toward a permanent Contadora agreement.

We must support the most humane, most democratic faction that we can find. I am convinced, from my visit to the area, from my personal discussions with many people on this matter, that the Contras represent the best, perhaps the only, chance that Nicaragua has of becoming a democratic nation.

At the same time, I recognize that the Contras are not perfect, and are not all that we would want them to be. They are virtually untrained and unsophisticated, and there is no question that some have been a part to incidents of brutality. But while they are not perfect, they are the resistance—they are the only opposition to the brutal, repressive Sandinista regime.

Of the $100 million aid requested, $3 million is specifically held for human rights programs. I believe in that as strongly as I believe in the necessity to support the Contras. We must keep up the pressure on the Contras to respect human rights and democratic principles. We know that the Sandinistas, by their own admissions, will never adhere to such cherished ideals.

This issue is not popular, but this is one time when we must look beyond the popularity of an issue and focus on what is at stake. We will be casting a vote tomorrow that will have both short-range and long-term implications, not only for ourselves, but for our neighbors and for the rest of the free world. The future of democracy is on the line.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the time remaining on both sides?

The CHAIRMAN. The minority has 39 minutes remaining and the majority has 26½ minutes remaining of today's debate.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOLF].

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, as we debate today the request for $100 million for the Contras who are fighting to regain basic civil and human rights in their country of Nicaragua, I recall my meeting in 1984 with then Archbishop and now Cardinal Obando y Bravo in Nicaragua. I was so impressed with this leader of the Catholic Church who has called for a national reconciliation in his country and who is trying against mounting odds to bring justice to the citizens of Nicaragua.

His statements to me take on even more significance today as I hear some of my colleagues argue against providing U.S. support for the cause of freedom of which Cardinal Bravo is such an important leader.

As we consider this aid package for Nicaragua's democratic opposition, I believe it is important to heed the message of Cardinal Bravo who speaks the truth about conditions in his country today.

Marxism is trying to eliminate the Church in Nicaragua because Marxism is the enemy of the Church.

The Sandinista government intends to eliminate the Catholic Church in order to implant the so-called Popular Church.

We want to state clearly that this government is totalitarian * * *. We are dealing with a government that is an enemy of the Church.

The major part of the (Nicaraguan) people are unhappy but they are also afraid * * * we are fighting a monster that includes the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, and Cuba * * * and this revolution could spread to Mexico or other parts of the hemisphere.

In the face of censorship of sermons and harassment of priests and churchgoers, Cardinal Bravo still continues to pursue basic human rights and freedoms which the people of Nicaragua were promised after the 1979 revolution. He continues to be the true voice of the people, not the Popular Church which has been set up by the Sandinistas as a propaganda piece, and his faith is reflected in this statement:

We believe the Church will continue to exist, and history, which is the mother of life, teaches us that the Church has always witnessed the burial of those who persecute her.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this aid package to keep the pressure on the Sandinista government to enter into good-faith negotiations with the democratic opposition and provide the people of Nicaragua with some hope for a future free from oppression.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN].

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, Charles Krauthammer, in his article in Sunday's Post, I think put it very well. After he talked about the question of the red scare of 1986 that some have suggested is about in this Capitol, he said this:

It seems to me an unexceptionable and rather undeniable fact: if the contras wither, as House Democrats devoutly wish, there will be an irreversible consolidation of Sandinista power in Nicaragua. Can anyone present a remotely plausible scenario in which the Sandinistas, unforced, either relinquish power or permit a free competition for power—i.e., a democratic election?

That does not mean that those who are against contra aid want to see a communist Nicaragua. But the consequence of their position, however unintended, is certainly not unforeseen.

We are told in domestic law of the United States that we are responsible for the unintended but nonetheless foreseen consequences of our actions, and that is what we are talking about here. We are talking about whether or not there will be any change in terms of the Government of Nicaragua if we do not act.

Then the question was brought up time and time again by opponents on the other side that it is not really in our interests to do anything. One of the speakers said if you could show me that somehow this government in Nicaragua was somehow actually jeopardizing the national interest of the United States Government, then maybe, just maybe we might act. Pardon me, but it seems to me that that suggests the isolationism sentiment that ruled this country between World War I and World War II. Unfortunately, my party happened to be saying the things at that time, and we thought we could close ourselves off.

The big criticism on Vietnam was that it was too far away, we did not have really established interests there. In fact, that probably was our undoing. People did not firmly understand why we had interests there.

Now we are told Nicaragua, which just happens to be closer to the students I was speaking with by telephone in Torrence, CA, in my district than Washington, DC, is too far away to be interested. We trivialize it by saying when are the hordes going to come, when are the troops going to come.

Maybe we ought to just look and see what happened with Cuba. Fidel Castro took over in Cuba, and then what has happened? Ten percent of the entire population now resides in the United States. If you apply very simple arithmetic to Central and South America, you can see that the problems we are having on our southern border are a mere trickle compared to what we would have if we do not do something.

We have all sorts of problems in the House trying to pass immigration legislation, yet everybody gets on the floor and says we do not deny there is an immigration problem. We do not deny that we have a funnel of illegal aliens coming across our border. Let me just tell you if you think that is a funnel, wait until we have something where the people of Central America know that this Congress will not allow a President to respond until—until when? As other speakers have said, until we can prove a direct threat to the United States on our doorstep.

What kind of folly is that? The problem is now. The problem is that we have to act here in the House of Representatives.

We talked about why we are standing here as Members of Congress. Let me just tell you, as a father of a 12-year-old son, I happen to think a vote tomorrow for $100 million to assist Contra aid is the best thing I can do for my son to make sure he is not going to be fighting in Central and South America 6 years from now.

Those of you who say look, let us wait until the problem gets so bad that we send marines in, fine. If that is your option, take it; put it up on the floor and let us vote on it. But if all your option is to say everything the President presents is to be questioned, we have got to doubt him, we have got to vote it down, then count me out. For my son, I am going to vote for $100 million for the Contras.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Tennessee [Mrs. LLOYD].

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I went to San Salvador, to Honduras, to a refugee camp on the Nicaraguan border and also met in Panama with United States military officials at our Southern Command. I went with my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MAVROULES]. I went for honest answers. I wanted to know what steps were right and what things were right to bring an end to the conflict in Central America.

I am going to vote no tomorrow, but I am going to vote for an alternative around April 15 that would provide firmer guidelines for funds to the Contras. I think it is necessary that we build a long-term policy for Central America and I am convinced that this policy must have at least 4 parts.

First, it is absolutely necessary that we support the new peace initiative offered by President Duarte. At the President's office in San Salvador last Friday, Mr. Duarte outlined the initiative he has proposed to Daniel Ortega in Nicaragua.

"On the same day and at the same hour" President Duarte has pledged to meet with the rebels in El Salvador—if—President Ortega will meet with political and military opposition groups in Nicaragua.

That is step one.

Mr. Duarte also proposed a Contadora/Central American summit of the region's Presidents which may lead to the establishment of a permanent forum for dialog and consultation among all the countries and interests in the region.

President Duarte's initiative is both hopeful and positive. But time must be provided for his program to work.

The Duarte proposal, however, must be just the start.

For as a second point, any program Congress approves must include assistance for refugees. For the homeless and suffering, democracy must mean more than boots and bullets. If you have any doubts, visit the refugee camps and look into the faces of the children.

Third, any military assistance provided for the Contras, should be fenced for a brief period—perhaps 60 to 90 days. This limited time provides sufficient opportunity for President Duarte to pursue his peace initiative and press for the regional summit.

Saturday morning, during a meeting with President Azcona of Honduras, I asked him for his views on any delays. His response was direct, "a small period of waiting after any legislation is passed—would be very helpful for the negotiations—the negotiations of a political settlement with Nicaragua."

President Azcona was frank and to the point. While preoccupied with the internal situation in Nicaragua, he was clear that Honduras cannot direct resources away from the economy into an arms race with Nicaragua.

But, like President Duarte, Mr. Azcona prefers a political settlement.

However, should the negotiations not occur—should Nicaragua refuse to participate in a diplomatic process—our response should be automatic. Once that time period has passed, the President should be free to certify the release of any Contra aid funds approved by Congress.

Finally, as a fourth point in any U.S. program, the specifics of any military aid package should be tailored to the direct needs of the Contras.

The four points I have outlined, supporting the new Duarte initiative, assisting the refugees, establishing a brief period or waiting before any Contra aid funds are released, and tailoring any military assistance to specific needs, these points must be included in any package of legislation this Congress approves.

"I want to prove that a democratic revolution is better than a Communist revolution," was President Duarte's concluding remark last Friday in San Salvador. His hope must become our goal.

We must as the greatest deliberative body in the world develop a true bipartisan compromise. If we can do that, we will have taken the first steps toward the long-term policy that Central America needs.

□ 1820

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SHAW].

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal of expression on this floor, and I doubt whether in closing part of tonight we will hear anything new, any new ideas that have not already been put forth.

We know the reasons why we want the aid, and I do stand in strong support of the President's request.

We do for two reasons. One is because the Sandinista has double-crossed the people; that people of Nicaragua whom we felt we were supporting at the time we asked Somoza to leave. We bear responsibility for that, and there have been gross abuses of human rights by the present Government of Nicaragua.

We do so also for another reason which on its own can stand; and that is for the security of the United States. We have heard a lot from those that are opposed, and many of the people have been opposed, have been talking about the involvement of American troops.

Well, I have two sons that have just registered for the draft, the youngest of whom is 18. And those of you who have not seen your son go down and register for the draft, it is a very sobering experience, and one that wants, in the deepest part of your inner being, wants America to never be involved in a war where American troops are sent over. Never be involved in a war where the draft is again instituted.

We have a chance to fight this war with Nicaraguans, and that is right. All they need is some help. If the Soviets had not been so deeply involved in pumping military aid into Nicaragua, the Sandinistas would be gone.

So that is, if it is something that the Soviets want, do we know it is something that we must react to, but particularly when it is our own hemisphere.

I will ask—one thing that disturbs me, and maybe one of the speakers to come on the other side will answer this question: We have seen time after time, Members come to the well of the House and oppose aid, and this has been by some of the most staunch civil libertarians in this House—how in the world can you stand up and ask that the same civil liberties that we enjoy in this country not go to the people of Nicaragua?

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Maryland [Ms. MIKULSKI].

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, our foreign policy toward Central America should reflect the same principles of freedom and democracy we hold so dear in this Nation. We must recognize our legitimate national security interests by acknowledging every nation's right to self-determination. No country has the right to dictate the economic and political institutions of other nations. We do have a moral imperative to encourage democracy, not dictatorships.

This administration has persistently disregarded the real issues in Central America. Over the past 6 years, the administration has sent more than $100 million to the Contras. Now it asks for another $100 million. It has spent over $250 million in the region on military bases in Honduras, mines in Nicaraguan harbors, and surveillance flights overhead. But after all this aid, the Contras have little territory and scant support among the Nicaraguan people.

Nicaragua is a nation plagued by poverty, disease, and malnutrition. Most Nicaraguans want good crops, a roof over their heads, and a safe environment for their families. Additional military assistance from the United States will only cause further bloodshed and further aggravation of their desperate situation.

Aiding the Contras in the best of economic times is wrong. Financing more violence in Central America in a time of belt-tightening and cutbacks here at home is unthinkable. American students need loans to attend college. Children and the elderly need funds for health care. This administration proposes to cut these programs, and this same administration wants to send $10,000 to each of the Contras at a time when the per capita income in Nicaragua is $1,000.

American taxpayers want their money spent on worthy causes that attain concrete results. They deserve nothing less.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, let me talk about the options.

I love democracy dearly.

I believe the United States should support the development of democracy, everywhere.

The question is not why or where, but how. Unfortunately, a single formula is not applicable, as to for example, Poland, Afghanistan, South Korea, the Philippines under Marcos, Cuba, or Nicaragua.

Democracy is in bleak shape in Nicaragua. Its Government is actively allied with chief antagonists of democracy—the Soviet Union.

The United States has several options.

The first is to do nothing. That is unacceptable, because of the Sandinista suppression of democracy inside Nicaragua and their efforts to foment trouble outside their borders.

The other options are:

To apply all types of nonmilitary pressure for change inside Nicaragua and to use all necessary means to prevent the Sandinistas from undermining their neighbors;

Or, next, provide military assistance to the Contras; and Finally, use U.S. military force within Nicaragua.

Evidence is strong that the President's proposed military aid to the Contras will not work.

If its objective is to pressure the Sandinistas to change, military aid to the Contras seems more likely than not to increase the intransigency of the Sandinistas; and the closer to the mark is the President's and Mr. Buchanan's description of the Sandinistas, the more hopeless are the prospects for any meaningful agreement by the Sandinistas to open up their society or share power. Further, it must be noted, the Reagan record is not one of using added pressure to negotiate effectively.

If the objective of Contra aid is really not pressure on, but overthrow of, the Sandinistas, such aid by itself, certainly $100 million, is unlikely to work—given the past record of the Contras, the likelihood of a counter response of more Soviet aid, the divisions among the Nicaraguan people, and the attitudes of Nicaragua's governmental neighbors in Central America against such overthrow.

Whether the rhetoric and record of the administration to date, the more we would adopt its option of Contra aid, the more likely it is that the final option will follow—direct U.S. military intervention.

We are left with as effective an implementation as possible of the remaining option. At best, it would mean a combination of containment of and change in the Sandinista regime. At worst, it would result in that regime's containment and isolation on the Central American mainland. That would not be an optimal result. It is better, though, than the likely result of the President's proposal now before us. I urge we reject it.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SILJANDER].

Mr. SILJANDER. "Human Rights in Nicaragua, From Revolution to Repression," by the State Department, a report that tells all.

Catholic Church has been singled out for attacks.

Censorship of sermons.

Harassment of the Pope. Even accusing Obando y Bravo of being a CIA agent—how ridiculous!

Confiscation of Catholic Church newsletters.

Fifty Moravian churches were burned to the ground by the Sandinistas.

The entire Jewish community driven out of the country; and they have called the Jewish community Synagogues of Satan, and said that all the world's money is in the hands of the Jews.

They have also said there is a myth of the chosen people; that myth is promoted to massacre, they say, Palestinians.

Mr. Chairman, some would say these moral arguments against the Sandinista government are not sufficient to assist in insurgency; and maybe so, but we are doing it because we see the broader picture. We see the Soviet global, geopolitical strategy.

We respond 10,000 miles away in the Middle East by giving millions—billions of dollars to Egypt, a moderate country, and to Israel. It seems so obvious.

Thirteen thousand miles away in Asia, in the Far East, we give money to the freedom fighters in Afghanistan and in Cambodia, and that seems so obvious.

Eight thousand miles away in Africa, to secure the ores and minerals indigenous only to the Soviet Union and the southern part of that continent, we help the freedom fighters in Angola, and it seems so obvious.

In our own Americas, the same people forced out the Jews, persecute the Protestants and the Catholics are saying, and I quote, that:

Libyan fighters, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people have reached them because they fight with us. They fight America on its own ground.—Mu'ammar Qadhafi, September 1, 1984, the New York Times.

Thomas Borge, July 22, 1980 says that:

We say to our brother Arafat that Nicaragua is his land and the PLO cause is the cause of the Sandinistas.

Why are the PLO there? So many that there are two bars catering exclusively in Managua to the Palestinians? Why are Ayatollah Khomeini's radicals training there? And Qadhafi's radicals training there?

It is because the PLO is looking for a homeland in Central America? Are they after the bananas?

I think it is quite obvious. It is far more obvious than why we send money tens of thousands of miles away.

□ 1830

There are terrorist training camps in Nicaragua. There was a comment made on the floor today: How can 3 million poor people be a threat to the United States? Well, I had to look into the eyes of the parents of Bill Zimmerman of Grand Haven, MI, because one crazy-eyed fundamentalist radical Moslem drove his car bomb into the Marine barracks in Lebanon, one person, and killed over 240 of our Marines. When the first terrorist bomb, my colleagues, blows up in San Diego, in Florida, in Texas, Louisiana, there will be a cry by all the Americans: "Why didn't we do something to stop it before it escalated this far?" And the $100 million that we are so desperately seeking for the freedom fighters today will look trivial in light of the billions of dollars and the commitment of tens of thousands of our own boys at our own borders. If we allow subversion, revolution, death, terrorism, and the waves of human bodies fleeing from all that tyranny to occur, don't blame me, don't say it was your fault. Don't say, "It was your fault." The blame will go squarely on the shoulders of those who knew full well the impact of those terrorist training centers, who have been persecuting those peoples for years. Do not blame me. Look to those who have decided to avoid the issue and not see the reality of the terrorist devastation before us in the Americas.

Mr. Chairman, the Sandinista's overthrow of the Somoza dictatorship in Nicaragua was originally welcomed by most of the international community with optimistic enthusiasm. The United States, in fact gave the new Sandinista regime over $130 million in aid during its first 2 years, including an $8 million grant to sustain the Nicaraguan Government Elment in the first hours of the revolution. This optimism faded, however, into a cruel nightmare for the Nicaraguan Jews and Christians as well as the neighboring nations of El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica. The reason: the Sandinista's selling of their country to radical Marxist elements, most notably, the Cubans and the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO].

In a recent speeh in London, Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn stated:

Within the philosophical system of Marx and Lenin and at the heart of their psychology, hatred of God is the principal driving force, more fundamental than all their political and economic pretensions. Militant atheism is not merely incidental or marginal to Communist policy; it is not a side effect, but the Central pivot. To achieve its diabolical ends, Communism needs to control a population devoid of religious and national feeling, and this entails the destruction of faith and nationhood.[1]

Nicaraguan leadership, by proclaiming itself a revolution without borders and by declaring itself in solidarity with Yasser Arafat in the world revolution and by its harsh persecution of religious groups has set itself up as a model example of Solzhenitsyn's analysis. Most likely because of the Sandinista's link to the PLO, the Jews have been the most thoroughly oppressed religious group in Nicaragua, if not in numbers then certainly in the completeness to which their exile and cultural genocide took place.

The PLO desire to overthrow the Somoza regime had nothing to do with the legitimate revolution of Nicaraguan citizens against the dictatorship. It had historical roots of its own. Just why Nicaragua is of concern to the PLO is best explained in the autobiography of Jerusalem's mayor Teddy Kollek, entitled "For Jerusalem." He revealed that Nicaragua played a major role in obtaining arms for Israel during the crucial period of its creation in 1943. Kollek met the older General Somoza in Nicaragua to plead Israel's case.

According to Kollek:

Somoza as well as the Nicaraguan foreign minister cooperated because of their strong basic sympathy with our cause. Our agreement included the understanding that Nicaragua would vote for Israel in the United Nations whenever the occasion arose, a point to which they pledged themselves out of genuine conviction.

Prior to the 1979 Sandinista revolution, Nicaragua had consistently supported Israel in the United Nations and was one of the very few nations that voted against the resolution condemning Zionism as racism.[2]

Clearly, the PLO had a vested interest in overthrowing the Somoza regime in Nicaragua. The results of the alliance between the Sandinistas and the PLO are evident upon Nicaraguan society. This paper will examine the PLO-Sandinista link and attempt to demonstrate the existence of the religious persecution in Nicaragua and other Central American countries, particularly against the Jewish community.

ARAB INVOLVEMENT IN LATIN AMERICA

Latin America has always been an important source of support to Israel in the United Nations. In Israel's first 25 years of existence Latin American nations provided more than one-half of the U.N. votes supportive of Israel. During the 1967 war, Latin America was more supportive of Israel than any other bloc of countries. However, by the seventies their support had weakened as Latin American nations began to split into political factions. Still today, Israel and Arab nations perceive Latin America to be important politically to the survival of Israel.

[1] Foot notes at end of article.

In a visit to Mexico in 1975, Egypt's Vice Chancellor Gamal Mansour expressed the importance of Latin American U.N. votes:

For the Arabs, the support of Latin American countries is essential because they hope to obtain a majority for a resolution in the next Assembly of the United Nations * * * recognizing the right of the Palestinians to convert themselves into a political entity; to permit the Arabs to recuperate the territories occupied in the war of 1967 and confirm the principle that no country can acquire territories of another by force.

Gamal Mansour's visit was only one of many such Arab missions in the Arab League campaign to sway Latin America toward a pro-Arab stance. The Latin American governments resisted Arab efforts; however, the 1973 quadrupling of oil prices put new pressures upon their economies and international policies.

The Arabs began to use petrodollars and vitally needed oil to pressure the Latin American nations into the Arab camp. Fouad Naffah, who was the Lebanese Foreign Minister and acting as a representative to the Arab League in 1973, traveled to seven Latin American nations. In his tour, he informed the governments that "no underdeveloped country that backs the just cause of the Arab world will suffer from an energy shortage." In addition to a guaranteed oil supply, Naffab also made promises of Arab investments to strengthen the suffering Latin American economies.

In 1981, Arab representatives met in Tunis and decided to focus on gaining the support of Latin America in an effort to oust the Israelis. In conjunction with this decision, "they decided to unleash an anti-Semitic campaign designed to undermine the status of Jews in Latin America, to nullify the political and economic support which the Latin American Jewish communities provide Israel." [3] The Palestine Liberation Organization was selected as the primary instrument of the campaign in Latin America. "Arab ambassadors, other high ranking emissaries and representatives of the PLO have been crisscrossing the region in a coordinated, heavily financed effort to secure authorization to establish an official PLO office in every Latin American capital." [4]

The PLO has made limited progress during the past 3 years in its attempt to open offices in Latin American capitals. So far, the PLO has established offices in Cuba, Ecuador, Nicaragua, Peru, and Mexico. Brazil and Venezuela were thought to be prime candidates for the PLO; however, they have resisted the heavy Arab economic and political pressures. The main obstacle the PLO faces is the fact that it is an international terrorist network; and to allow the PLO to legitimatize themself in the region by opening an office would endanger the security of Latin American nations.

CRIMES AGAINST RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

The Sandinista government has been responsible for many abuses against the right to freedom of religion in Nicaragua. The Jews, so far, have been the most intensely targeted group for persecution. The Government began its campaign of persecution in the quasi-official government newspaper Nuevo Diario. On July 15 and 17, 1982, the paper carried articles that were not only anti-Zionist but also anti-Semitic. Jews were blamed for the crucifixion of Christ, using the "myth" of the chosen people to massacre Palestinians, and using financial power to gain political control of the United States. The articles referred also to "Synagogues of Satan," and rehearsed old canards that "world money, the banks and finance are in the hands of descendants of Jews, the eternal protectors of Zion."[5]

Although resident in Nicaragua for more than a century, the Jewish community has always been exceedingly small. The 1972 population of about 200 shrank to about 80 after the earthquake. After the overthrow of Anastasio Somosa in 1979, many Jews fled into exile, along with others close to the regime. Today, there are about 8 to 10 Jews living in Nicaragua, and only a few Jewish-owned firms. These individuals and businesses exist under the supressive conditions of he Sandinista regime.[6]

The main reason for the departure of Nicaraguan Jews is the manner in which the revolutionary government treated them. Their properties were among the first to be confiscated. Jews who owned factories and stores were ejected from their homes and places of business. Their properties were turned over to Arabs and local workers. Many accusations were made against them without proof. Often, their individual safety was threatened.[7] The foregoing took place in an environment politically and emotionally charged. Jews were accused of support for the Somoza government and blamed for Israeli assistance to the Somoza government.[8]

The final blow against the Jewish community came when Sandinista supporters scorched the doors of the only synagogue in Managua while worship services were in progress. The Sandinistas then seized the synagogue, destroying all religious items and putting progovernment posters over all religious symbols. The synagogue then became "an elite social club for the children of high-ranking Sandinista officials." [9] Since then, Jews have tried to regain their property and return to their homes, but the Nicaraguan Government has directed the courts not to act on any request by a Jew seeking to return to Nicaragua.[10]

On a number of occasions there have been attacks against religious leaders which have, at times, become violent. These attacks are not only specifically aimed at the Jewish religious, but also at the Christians, most notably the Catholics and the fundamental Moravian Church. The uneasy situation is caused by the fact that most Nicaraguan citizens are professed Catholics. These attacks have been sponsored by so-called devine mobs or confrontation groups of the Sandinista Front for the Liberation of Nicaragua [FSLN].[11] Harassment has also been extended to Pope John Paul II who in March 1983 visited Nicaragua and was subjected to inexcusable abuse. The Pontiff was forced to speak from a platform that had revolutionary billboards as a backdrop. Also during his homily, the Pope was barely audible to the large crowd because the Sandinista government provided him with a poor sound system which could not compete with the shouting of progovernment slogans by the divine mob.[12]

In addition, the Government banned from publication letters from Pope Paul II which criticized the Government's effort to create a Marxist peoples church.[13] The leaders of this peoples church have insulted the Catholic Church by trying to change the Christian doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. The offensive reinterpretation depicts Mary, the mother of Jesus, as in fact not the mother of Jesus, but the mother of the revolutionary.[14] The Government has also gone so far as to discredit the divinity of Jesus and instead label him "the First Sandinista."[15]

The Government actively discriminates between those clergy who share its political viewpoints and those who are indifferent or critical.[16] An example of this was seen when the regular church sponsored televising of the mass was replaced with broadcasts of priests who took a progovernment position.[17]

Of the east coast Indians and Creole natives in Nicaragua, 80 percent are members of the Protestant Moravian Church. The Government has repeatedly described the Moravian Church as a center of counterrevolutionary sentiment. As a result, the Sandinistas have reportedly burned more than 50 churches, confiscated church property, harassed church leaders, and taken other actions to undermine the traditional role of the church. In addition, Government groups had stepped up attacks on Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, and Seventh Day Adventists, accusing the sects of having direct links to the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency.[18]

The anti-Semitic curtain that has descended over Nicaragua, and any other place where Sandinista inspired revolutions have spread to, is one of serious repercussions for all Jews. To emphasize, one of the first moves taken by the Sandinista government when it took control was to cut off all diplomatic ties to Israel.[19] Obviously, this is consistent with the Sandinista's stated intention to root "Zionism" out of Central America. In fact, a bloc of Salvadorans based in Washington, DC, and loyal to the Sandinistas were asked to provide, "* * * condemnation of the Zionist state of Israel, because of its participation in maintaining the deplorable conditions under which the people of Palestine, El Salvador, and South Africa are forced to live." [20] The ideological union between the PLO and the Sandinistas begins to be exposed with this statement of direct anti-Semitic attitudes toward Israel.

THE PLO, THE SANDINISTAS AND THE SALVADORAN GUERRILLAS

On January 12, 1983, Daniel Ortega Saavedra, the commander of the revolution and a member of the FSLN delivered a speech to a special ministerial meeting of the coordinating bureau of the nonaligned countries on Latin America and the Caribbean. In this speech he labeled Israel's policies toward the Palestinians as being irresponsible and that criminal actions were being taken against "the heroic Palestinian people" by Israel.[21] As the Palestinians were being praised and exhorted by the Sandinistas, the Jewish citizens of Nicaragua were being essentially expelled from their own country. The Nicaraguan Jews blame the loss of their jobs, homes and businesses along with the general persecution on the presence of the PLO.[22]

Late in 1979, 1,000 delegates from Arab and Latin American nations met in Caracas, Venezuela. These delegates formed two organizations. The first is known as the Pan-American Institute of Arab Culture headquartered in Buenos Aires, and the second organization is the Arab-American Information, Publicity, and Communications Center based in Santiago, Chile. One of the basic initiatives of these two organizations is made clear in a communique published by the delegates saying that they would "* * * work for the free self-determination of the Palestinians and their right to a homeland * * * we consider the PLO the legitimate representative of that people * * *" [23] Victor Ananias of Chile, President of the Federation, was quoted in Agence France Presse (October 6, 1979) as stating, "The solution we propose for the Middle East is the disappearance of Israel to make way for a secular, democratic Palestinian state." [24] Other delegates were asked whether the PLO was a terrorist organization? Their reply was that the PLO armed activity was "legitimate defense." [25]

The PLO's involvement in covert operations with the Sandinistas is not a recent occurance. Active cooperation between these two revolutionary groups has existed as early as 1969 when Bonito Escobar of the Sandinistas met with three high-ranking PLO officials in Mexico City. As a result of this meeting, 50 Sandinistas were sent to training camps at PLO facilities in Tyre, Lebanon. Not only did they accept training, but they fought side-by-side with the PLO against King Hussein of Jordan in 1970. Patrick Arquello Ryan, a Sandinista trained in the Middle East, was Leila Khased's partner in an abortive attack on an El Al airliner just outside of Amsterdam (Ryan was killed in the attack). [26] The ties between the two groups has continued for 15 years without interruption.

As a result of this relationship, not much attention was given when the PLO announced a grant of $12 million to Nicaragua for economic aid.[27] The PLO also has helped the Sandinistas to gain support from other radical Arab countries such as Mu'ammar Qadhafi's Libya which has given $100 million under an "agricultural appropriation." [28] Qadhafi has in the past aided many other terrorist organizations such as the Montoneros in Argentina and the Revolutionary Coordinating Junta founded in 1974 as the first bridge between Latin America and Cuba. From January 25 to February 1, 1981, Libya sponsored a meeting with the Sandinistas, PLO, Montoneros, the JLR plus two other Marxist groups from Chile—the United Popular Action Movement and the Movement of the Revolutionary Left. The stated reason for the meeting was ". . . to draw up a unified plan of struggle against all types of fascism and imperialism in America." [29]

In addition to money, the PLO has been sending massive shipments of armaments to Nicaragua and El Salvador. U.S. News & World Report stated that there had been an interception of a plane load of weapons in Tunis which was sent to the Sandinistas by the PLO.[30] Weapons are always in abundance and training is also being provided for leftist forces in Central America.[31] The PLO cadres who have infiltrated into Nicaragua and El Salvador are providing this training.[32] Yasser Arafat has himself admitted that Sandinistas had received training in PLO camps.[33] The PLO stated in 1982 that it was fighting along side of the Sandinista guerrillas. These were actual PLO troops participating in combat in both El Salvador and Nicaragua.[34]

According to the Washington Post of July 12, 1979, there were Sandinista fighters training in PLO camps located in Algiers. The activity of the PLO was best summed up by this statement by Jorge Mandi, FSLN spokesman to the Kuwaiti newspaper Al Watan. He said, "* * * there is a long standing blood unity between us and the Palestinian revolution. Many of the units belonging to the Sandinista movement were at Palestinian revolutionary bases in Jordan * * * it is natural that in our war against Somoza we received Palestinian aid for our revolution in various forms."[35] These various forms included PLO pilots sent to Nicaragua and PLO freedom fighters sent to El Salvador.[36] Also a plane load of weapons in route to Nicaragua from the PLO labeled as medical supplies, just as the recent Libyan shipment, was intercepted in Brazil.[37] Those are suspected to be just two of many such shipments. In May 1982, the PLO gave a Boeing 707 jet to Nicaragua presumably for the purpose of transporting arms.[38] In addition, there is a Belgian Air-Charter Service that is wholly owned by the PLO that is used to transport arms to the insurgents in El Salvador, through Nicaragua.[39]

Diplomatic relations between the Sandinistas and the PLO started with a similar ideological base and has expanded to their commitments to overthrow governments that are contrary to their vision. In a letter from a group of Salvadorans based in Washington, DC and loyal to the Sandinistas, they stated, "* * * our situation is very much the same as the Palestinian Freedom Fighters." [40] Because of the unity between the FSLN and the PLO, Nicaragua cut off diplomatic relations with Israel and granted diplomatic status to the PLO on July 22, 1980. The office representing the PLO was officially opened in Managua with a staff of 70. The PLO's presence in Managua was accepted warmly as evidenced by the hero's welcome Arafat received when he visited Nicaragua on the first anniversary of the Sandinista takeover.[41] In his speech, Arafat praised the "strategic and militant ties between the Sandinista and Palestinian revolutions."[42]

Tomas Bouge Martinez, the Interior Minister of Nicaragua, stated to Yasser Arafat, "We say to our brother Arafat, that Nicaragua is his land and the PLO cause is the cause of the Sandinistas." In response to this statement of good will Arafat replied, "The links between us are not new. Your comrades did not come to our country just to train, but also to fight. Your enemies are our enemies." [43] Of course, the enemies of the PLO are the Jews, particularly those living in Israel. To demonstrate the joint efforts of the PLO and the Sandinistas against Israel, a bomb exploded in the Israeli embassy in San Salvador. The People's Revolutionary Army claimed responsibility and said the bombing was in "solidarity with the Palestinian people."[44]

THE PLO AND MEXICO

In 1975, Mexican President Luis Echeverria met with Yasser Arafat and gave the PLO permission to open an office in Mexico. The succeeding President of Mexico, Lopez Portillo, reluctantly honored his predecessor's commitment, and allowed the opening of a PLO office. However, the office was limited to a staff of one person without diplomatic status. In cooperation with the Association Mexicana de Amistad con el Pueblo Palestino [AMAPP], the PLO office has used cultural events to spread its message. In addition, the office has recruited exiled leftists and revolutionaries living in Mexico to work for their cause. Examples of the PLO activities in Mexico include anti-Israeli advertisements, publications, and demonstrations attacking "Zionism as Racism."

THE PLO AND COSTA RICA

On May 8, 1982, President Luis Alberto Monge announced an extension policy of internal security in order to combat the increasing terrorist activity in Costa Rica. In his speech he specifically expressed concern about the PLO and Libyan threat. The National Security Agency [ASN] of Costa Rica confirmed that Libya has been training young Costa Ricans as terrorists. The ASN has also linked Libya to the secret terrorist training camps operating in Costa Rica.

Many citizens of Costa Rica were alarmed with former President Rodrigo Carazo Odio's embrace of the Arab cause. It was reported that the Arabs had offered financial assistance to the president's pet project, the university of peace, in exchange for permission to open a PLO office. Ambassador Yamuni of Costa Rica increased the controversy when he announced to reporters that the Government had officially recognized the PLO. However, Foreign Minister Bernard Neihaus quickly denied the statement with good reason since Costa Rica has been struggling with high oil prices and terrorists activity.

THE PLO AND PANAMA

The Panamanian-Arab League of Solidarity with the Palestinian People and the PLO [LIGASOPOLP] have been working to gain support among the people of Panama. Carlos Perez Herrera, cousin of the late Gen. Omar Torrijos, was the first Secretary General of LIGASOPOLP. Torrijos was a commander of the Panamanian National Guard and the eminence gris of Panamanian politics. After the death of Torrijos in 1981, there has been a decrease in governmental support for the PLO. However, PLO activity and propaganda directed against the Panamanian Jewish community has been disruptive. LIGASOPOLP will continue to function in Panama with Libya as its main financial sponsor. The Panamanian Government has kept its promise to prevent the opening of an official PLO office, and there are no indications that they will break this promise.

CONCLUSION

PLO activity in Central America has been increasing, and there are no indications that their involvement will diminish. In 1981, Yasser Arafat, expressing the commitment of the PLO in that region of the world, stated:

We are a great revolution that can never be intimidated. We have connections with all the revolutionary movements throughout the world, in El Salvador, in Nicaragua—and I reiterate Salvador—and elsewhere in the world.[45]

"The way to Jerusalem leads through Managua," was more than just an empty statement made by Yasser Arafat on July 27, 1980. Arafat clearly intends to have Nicaraguan and Salvadoran support in his effort to destroy Israel and establish a Marxist regime.

The PLO, combined with the Soviet and Cuban presence, poses a serious threat to the security of the vulnerable Central American governments. The United States must take into consideration the Soviet-Cuban-PLO dimension, along with the PLO threat to the Jewish community, in order to have an effective American policy which protects our interests as well as Central American democracies and religious freedom.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

Mr. FAZIO. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, as I listened throughout the debate, I think a couple of things are beginning to come through, one of which is perhaps a bipartisan comment. And that is what a tragedy it is that it has taken us so long to focus as we have for the last several weeks and perhaps the last year or two on a part of the world that we have ignored for so many years. It has been well over 100 years since William Walker, the adventurer, took his crusade to Nicaragua. We have sent the Marines into Nicaragua in the twenties and thirties, the CIA in the forties, and now we are back with surrogates in the seventies, and eighties. But the real tragedy is we have ignored this part of the world for so long that we in effect are reaping the whirlwind of this ignorance.

I hope we can all resolve that despite our frustration at our limited options today that that will not be the case in the future. The speeches that we write, the essays that we submit so to speak like schoolchildren will somehow scar our consciences to the point that perhaps we will remember a little bit about this in a few years when things have sorted themselves out and we perhaps can do much more about it.

But it is also tragic that we somehow seem to ignore history. We have all been so proud of our accomplishments in the Philippines where we were the liberators, where we stored up a lot of political and economic and moral capital and where we could be helpful, but in Nicaragua we have a different legacy. We are the oppressor. We come with unclean hands, as I have just indicated.

When I made my trip to Central America as so many of us have recently done, I concentrated on what is real about the contra opposition, what is a fact and not what is an illusion or a figment of our collective imagination.

I wanted to know whether these people really were there, were organized, were committed, had a zeal for freedom and democracy and for a reversal of the Sandinista revolution that has gone awry because I came back absolutely committed to that fact. The Leninists are stealing the revolution.

I discovered that the fact was that there was not any "there" there; that the people in refugee camps on the Honduran border, for example, who ought to be the grist for the contra mill, were not interested in fighting to the death, to regain something they had lost. And they had lost something. The Pentacostals, the farmers do not like cooperatives, let alone Communists, let alone Marxist-Leninists. They felt a loss. There were some who were willing to go off at night with the Contras, make that futile effort here and there. But the heart of the potential contra army, the young men of Managua who had left because they did not want to be drafted into the Sandinista army convinced me that what their goal was was to come to Mexico City or New York and get an education. I said, "Aren't you interested in going off and doing battle with the Sandinistas? The response was, "No, the Contras are corrupt, they don't represent the future, they are not the kind of people that I want to fight for." They are not interested in going off with long supply lines in a futile fight against a growing Sandinista army; and the Sandinistas, those who fight, are committed ideologically and are dedicated whether we like it or not.

So I think what we are doing, and certainly this debate brings it out, is we are putting our own wish list, how we want it to be, up against the reality. I find that tragic. The Nicaraguan people are enduring this revolution as they have others that held promise which were ripped away from them. They are indomitable. They are still free to express themselves, by the way, in Nicaragua. They do not seem to fear the Sandinistas. They do not seem to revere the Contras. They are poor. The people who fight are often children.

Do you know how they deal with imminent capture? They defect. It is easier to go over to the other side and avoid potential harm. We saw in the refugee camp of Tua Pacente, that I visited, American policy flailing around for someplace to land. We are at sea. Sure, Eden Pastora is a romantic. People continue to think highly of him. But the CIA cannot work with him. He is not an operative guy. He is not like the people from UNO who can organize and raise money and spend it, sometimes even on Contra armies.

No, what we have against us now is history and reality. And if we fail to understand that and make this futile effort at spending $100 million it will lead to our regretting this history even more than that which we have already created.

As I indicated this past summer, I spent 10 days touring Central America where I met with a wide variety of individuals from political leaders and ambassadors to refugees and townspeople. I went with fellow Californians who were both bilingual and broadly based in our political views across the entire spectrum.

While in Nicaragua, I witnessed first hand the lack of broad support by the Nicaraguan people for the Contras and, indeed, I might add the Sandinistas. Despite the fact that we have already given the Contras well over $250 million, they control less territory than ever—they do not control a single town or village—and they stay primarily in safe havens in Honduras and Costa Rica. Despite the President's assertions, these bands are not going to be turned into an effective fighting force with mass appeal by giving them more U.S. aid that is wildly unrealistic.

Rather than being an effective military threat to the Sandinista regime, the Contras have largely waged war against civilian targets. In my candid and private discussions with numerous Nicaraguan citizens, I heard graphic accounts of the Contras attacking buses, agricultural cooperative workers, villages, and civilian government officials, while avoiding attack on Sandinista military units. I might add, I heard also about the increasing limitations on civil rights, the ecomonic "reforms" imposed by the Sandinista leaders and the limitations on the true Catholic church.

And during my discussions with soldiers of both the Contras and the Sandinistas it became clear that the foot-soldiers of neither group hold and strong ideological commitment to the views of their leaders. This is a "war of children," where the majority of those engaged in combat do not really understand why they are fighting. Rather than risk capture and possible death, the smart young man simply defects to the other side.

Despite the President's claim, I am convinced that providing aid will not lead to negotiations and a regional, diplomatic solution to this troubled region. The President has already had his opportunities in this area. In previous attempts to get Congress to agree to Contras aid, the administration has proclaimed its commitment to diplomatic negotiations—a commitment which has disappeared after aid is granted.

In 1983, for example, the administration promised that it would encourage church-mediated negotiations between the Contras and the Sandinistas, if Congress approved more Contra aid. Last year, the President again agreed to encourage a church-mediated internal dialog and a regional Contadora settlement. However, these talks never transpired. This time, the President has appointed Philip Habib as his special emissary to Central America, and claims that a "new" diplomatic effort will be made to force the Sandinistas to negotiate. But why should we believe the President now? Why should we believe that he has finally seen the need to pursue negotiations. $100 million in aid for the Contras will not help him achieve this goal. I believe Don Regan's candid comments on Sunday are the true administration position. "We want these guys out of there," he said.

I also reject the President's argument that the Sandinista regime poses a threat to the rest of Central America and thus necessitates our involvement. Nicaragua is an impoverished country, with less than three million people. The Sandinistas have not shown any inclination to attack their neighbors. In fact, Nicaragua's two neighbors, Costa Rica and Honduras, appear far more concerned by the prospect of further aid to the Contras than by any threat from the Sandinistas. For example, the president of Costa Rica has called on President Reagan to increase economic rather than Contra aid to Central America. Both nations believe that an enlarged Contra war would drag them into the conflict, thereby jeopardizing their security and stability far more than the continued existence of the Sandinista regime.

But this doesn't seem to matter to President Reagan. As Michael Kinsley wrote recently, "The essence of the Reagan Doctrine is indifference to the standard of international behavior implied in the idea of sovereignty."

In other words, it doesn't matter to President Reagan that we are supporting a guerrilla war—in essence a foreign invasion—against a sovereign nation. Few people are troubled when we try to shore up an established democracy. But that is not the situation in Nicaragua. This is not like Afghanistan. We are not helping those who are trying to repel a foreign invasion. In this situation, the United States is the one violating Nicaragua's sovereignty. We are the ones breaking the peace.

And this does make a difference. Good intentions are not enough. It's not enough that President Reagan wants to restore "freedom" and democracy to Nicaragua. I don't question that. But U.S. policy in Central America must take into consideration other factors than the ideology of a regime. We must carefully consider other factors such as the unanimous opposition of Nicaragua's neighbors to the President's proposal to aid the contras and our historical role in Nicaragua.

Our historical role in Nicaragua has been very telling. The United States has been in the forefront of foreign interference in Nicaragua for more than a century.

As I said earlier, from 1855 when American Commodore Cornelius Vanderbilt and American adventurer, William Walker, landed in Nicaragua to establish their own empire, to the 42-year reign of Somoza family, a military dictatorship put in power by the U.S. Marines, the U.S. role in Nicaragua has been anything but concerned with democracy and the "freedoms" of the Nicaraguan people.

Now is the time to change. Now, is the time to encourage peace and negotiation to resolve the problems in Nicaragua and not, as President Reagan suggests, spend more on military aid. The real threat to stability in Central America is the poverty and repression that is present in most countries in the region. Economic and political injustice produced the revolution in Nicaragua, have fueled the civil war in El Salvador, and are a constant threat to the stability of virtually every other country in Central America. These are our real enemies. And these are villains with which we should be waging war by using a wide range of diplomatic and economic resources available to strengthen national civilian rule to promote Democracy and free institutions.

We must focus our energies on the Contadora process and search for a peace treaty which addresses military, economic and political issues in the entire region.

To supplement my remarks, I'd like to include an excellent viewpoint article by the able journalist Michael Kinsley published in the "Wall Street Journal":

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 13, 1986]

THE GRENADA ILLUSION: WAR CAN LOOK EASY IN HINDSIGHT

(By Michael Kinsley)

On Oct. 25, 1983, the American people woke up and discovered they'd won a war. By the time most folks heard about the invasion of Grenada—indeed, by the time they first heard of Grenada—the landing force of 1,200 Marines and 700 Army rangers, supplemented later by 800 more paratroopers, had subdued a few hundred Cuban construction workers and military advisers, ousted some vicious lunatics called the New Jewel movement, and restored freedom to a grateful people. The cost was 18 dead on our side, about 60 on theirs.

The whole thing was as good as over in time for The Wall Street Journal to editorialize the next day: "Who will tell us that replacing the murderous government of Grenada and restoring order and democracy is immoral? If no one will say that what happened in Grenada is wrong, why should a different morality apply in the rest of Latin America and the rest of the world?" And the party poopers did sound rather foolish, babbling lamely about the Rio Treaty and the United Nations Charter while the Grenadans celebrated the liberation of their island and Americans enjoyed a nostalgic imperial frisson.

Nothing succeeds like success. The Reagan administration, understandably, would like to make Grenada the metaphor for its foreign policy. If it was a good thing to free Grenada, what is wrong with freeing Nicaragua? But as a guide for dealings in the real world, the test-tube war in Grenada is a dangerous illusion. The Grenada illusion, in a nutshell, is that you can make war in hindsight. If you knew for certain in advance what the outcome of any act of agression would be, and at what cost—as the editors of the Journal in effect did when they started drawing the lessons of Grenada—running an aggressive foreign policy wouldn't be very difficult, or very interesting. Uncertainty about the outcome and the cost is not just a practical problem, but a moral one. It's what makes fomenting aggression the issue in Nicaragua, different not just in degree but in kind from the diplomatic maneuvering we engaged in, at the end, in the Philippines.

A few months ago Israel hijacked a Libyan civilian jet, thinking, incorrectly, that terrorist leaders were on board. When all the major Western nations objected, Israeli diplomat Abba Eban responded indignantly that there wouldn't have been any complaints from these quarters if the operation had worked. This is the Grenada illusion. It didn't work. And it's precisely because these things sometimes don't work that we have neutral standards of international behavior that don't depend, for their justification, on the goal involved. There will always be bad guys who flout these standards, of course. But international civil aviation happens to be a good example of an area where the standards survive despite regular flouting, to the great benefit of the civilized world. They won't survive if the civilized forces adopt the attitude that the end justifies the means—even if the end is not achieved.

The essence of the Reagan Doctrine is indifference to the standard of international behavior implied in the idea of sovereignty. Jimmy Carter was happy to help Afghanistan try to repel a foreign invasion. Few people are troubled when we help shore up an established foreign democracy. What's different about Mr. Reagan is his willingness to help the (ostensibly) good guys when they're out of power, and not just because of a foreign occupation. Put that way, it seems like so much common sense. When freedom is at stake, why should we honor a home-court advantage? The simple answer is that when you violate another nation's sovereignty, you're the side that's breaking the peace.

This also wouldn't matter much if you could be sure the result would be freedom at a proportionate cost, to you and to your intended beneficiaries. But that's the Grenada invasion. You can't be sure. That doesn't mean you can never act, but it means good intentions aren't enough of a reason. And it means other factors the Reaganites are contemptuous of—such as the support or otherwise of neighbors and allies, and a decent humility about our historical role—belong in the calculation. When you've already invaded Nicaragua twice, resulting in a 40-year dictatorship followed by a Marxist takeover, you'd better be pretty certain of what you're up to before trying it again, even by proxy.

Supporters of the contra war exaggerate the certainty of everything at issue: the nature of the Sandinistas and their goals, the nature of the contras and their goals, what will happen if we keep this war going, what will happen if we don't. They have to, to maintain the Grenada illusion. On Monday President Reagan charged his opponents with holding "an ideology that automatically identified anyone wearing fatigues, carrying a rifle and spouting Marxist slogans as a liberator of his nation." That doesn't describe the beliefs of anyone I know, but make it "anti-Marxist slogans" and it's a pretty good description of Mr. Reagan's own giddy enthusiasm for "freedom fighters."

I don't doubt that Mr. Reagan sincerely wants freedom and democracy for Nicaragua, but his administration has yet to offer a plausible scenario for how we get from here to there. Even beforehand, there wasn't much mystery about the result in Grenada (though it easily could have been messier than it was). In Nicaragua, $100 million of aid to the contras won't achieve the result Mr. Reagan wants. Patrick Buchanan has put the administration on record that the peril in Central America is great enough to justify committing U.S. troops. At the same time, the administration insists that committing U.S. troops is the last thing it has in mind. Essentially, Mr. Reagan wants the moral credit for the outcome he desires without taking on the moral onus of the potential cost. Mr. Reagan also seems unaware (to be generous) of the actual cost his policy imposes on the people it's intended to help. The invasion of Grenada was great for local business. Besides their freedom, the Grenadans got an even better new airport than the one the Cubans were building for them. The contra war is very different.

The president told a preposterous story Monday of some contras faced with the decision whether to blow up a power plant. "And those contras, those freedom fighters, said no, that this would hurt the people of Nicaragua, and we don't want to hurt the people, our people." Touching. But what are we paying the contras for if not to blow up power plants? Has Mr. Reagan forgotten the CIA mining of Nicaraguan harbor two years ago? The breakdown of social order and the destruction of the nation's economy are central goals of any serious guerrilla war. It's ironic that Mr. Reagan accuses the Sandinistas of being "Leninist," since our strategy in Nicaragua, to the extent we have one, is the classic Leninist technique of nursing rebellion by "heightening the contractions."

For about a month after Grenada, the polls showed Americans ready to go to war almost anywhere. They soon reverted to their usual attitude, hypocritical but comforting, or supporting a tough foreign policy in the abstract while opposing any particular exercise of force. The Journal, which trumpeted the post-Grenada polls with glee, now asserts defensively (Tuesday) that the contra war has the support of the electorate, "whatever the polls say." I'm afraid not. Most of us have recovered from the Grenada illusion.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACK].

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, Florida has a special interest in this issue. That may be because my home is closer to Managua than it is to Chicago, maybe it is because of the 1.2 million Hispanics that live in Florida, maybe it is because of the huge number of veterans that live in Florida, and maybe it is because of the huge number of retirees, many of whom were involved not only in the Second World War but in the First World War, fighting for freedom around the world.

There is great division, no question, great division about this issue. But most casual observers and listeners seem to conclude that both parties are attempting to accomplish the same thing.

Well, the next comment they make is that they want to accomplish that same thing but by different means. And I say they are wrong. There is a difference. One party has peace as its objective above all things. The other party, our party, says that it is freedom above all things that must be won.

There is peace in Poland today, but there is no freedom; there is peace in Czechoslovakia, but there is no freedom; there is peace in Hungary, but there is no freedom; there is peace in Cuba, but there is no freedom.

It is because of their commitment to freedom, it is their desire to accomplish freedom in Central America, that the freedom fighters have not given up. It is for that reason that the Hispanic community in Florida, which by the way has a commission, a Hispanic commission established in Florida in 1976 by the State legislature with 15 members appointed by the Governor, 11 Democrats, 3 Republicans, 1 Independent. They passed a resolution supporting the freedom fighters and supporting the $100 million request. Many of the men and women that they represent know that it means a lot more and know what they lost when they left their homeland to come to this country. They know why they lost that freedom. That is why they have asked us to support the President and to provide the $100 million in aid.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN].

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the President's request to send $100 million to Nicaragua.

President Reagan has called on Americans to let their elected Representatives know of their support for his $100 million package of military and nonlethal aid to the Contras seeking the overthrow of the Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

Well, Mr. Chairman, over the last several weeks, and particularly during the last couple of days, I have received hundreds of phone calls and letters from Kansans on this question. But the majority of the views expressed have not been in support of the President's proposal. By a margin of nearly 2 to 1, Kansans have been telling me that they oppose the package before us today. Many have taken umbrage with the suggestion that their position on this issue calls into question their patriotism.

Since I believe that Kansans and their opinions reflect a serious, sensible, fairminded, and progmatic approach to policy questions such as the one before us, I would like to share with my colleagues excerpts from a number of their communications. I hope the President is listening.

A petroleum geologist writes:

Please cast your vote against further aid to the Contras in Nicaragua. We have not given Contadora any chance at all, and in view of this it is absolutely against all our basic principles to seek a military solution.

From the owner of a truck line comes this reason for opposing additional funding to the Contras:

It does not appear right that we should support a group of people in an effort to overthrow a sovereign government by terroristic methods.

A student writes:

I am upset that the Congress is considering aiding the Contra forces that are largely made up of Somoza's National Guard. * * * As a student that has studied and traveled abroad, I have noticed that people of other nations are aware of the contradiction between the ideals and foreign policy of the U.S.A. I feel that his vote is a chance to show that the United States believes in its ideals.

From a minister, I hear this:

I recognize that powerful forces in this region seek to utilize the tragic situation for political purposes, and I call on both the United States and the Soviet Union to cease using areas such as Central America as playgrounds for superpower hostilities and politics.

From a professor of Soviet and East European studies, I hear this:

When the vote comes up for aid to the Contras, vote against it. * * * All Latin American democracies are against it, our European allies don't approve of it, and all we are doing is making Nicaragua more and more dependent on aid from the Soviet Union and her allies.

A rural Kansan writes:

When the opportunity arrives, we hope you will cast your vote against this attempt to interfere where we have no right to be. As a nursing home administrator, I sure would like to see that $100 million spent on our own affairs, like, maybe, aid to the elderly poor.

Other Kansans offered these perspectives, and I quote:

—With the recent rise in unemployment in Kansas to 6.3 percent, I find it difficult to support a foreign policy that calls for $100,000 million to support the contras;

—After the 100 million dollars is gone they will want more and more. We would feel that we had to follow up with armed forces. We cannot afford this kind of gift. Our government is in the red now;

—I hold few if any illusions about the Sandinista government. I do believe that if we are to allow the Nicaraguans to choose their own government and be able to influence Nicaraguan policies in a positive way, we must change the way we deal with the current government in Nicaragua;

It astounds me to hear President Reagan call these forces "freedom fighters," given their past associations with the Somoza regime. It is an insult to the patriots of the American revolution to extend this title to these present-day rebels;

As an American and a Republican, I believe I may enter a protest. When the President of these United States says or even infers that those of us who may be in disagreement with some of his opinions or policies are unpatriotic or may even be abetting or adding stature to Communism, I resent that very much.

And finally, a constituent from Wichita writes:

I have never before written to a politician but I feel very strongly about this issue. We must not support the Contras. * * * This great country must not stoop so low. Please represent me, vote against the Contras.

Like the Kansans I have quoted, I do not believe that large amounts of military aid will get us the results we should be seeking in Nicaragua. And what are those goals? They should be encouraging democracy and pluralism in Nicaragua, and greater stability in the whole of Central America. These goals will not be realized through military support of the Contra rebels, who have had difficulty not only in organizing themselves but in winning the hearts of the Nicaraguan people. They will not be realized through today's proposed military route because it does not have the support of many of Nicaragua's Latin neighbors. If efficacy were all that mattered, that alone would be enough to disapprove the aid request before us. But there are American principles to be applied here, and I, for one, am not ready to abandon those principles of nonintervention and self-determination.

I do not deny that the Sandinista government of Nicaragua is a radical one, and that is not something to be taken lightly. Our friends in the region, including El Salvador, Costa Rica, Guatemala and Honduras, are concerned about the potential for Nicaraguan intervention in their countries. But, having been to Nicaragua, I left with the very clear realization that it is a nation beset with problems not uncommon to other developing nations; poverty, illiteracy, lack of technology. Because of this, there remains a chance to bring about the true reforms that were anticipated with the overthrow of the Somoza regime. But I am convinced that this military aid package will not make that happen. If it is adopted, it will only move Nicaragua further—even irretrievably—into the Soviet camp. That is not what America wants to see happen.

Instead, we should pursue negotiations through the Contadora nations and perhaps accompany those efforts with a carrot and stick approach. The carrot could be the establishment of a constructive bilateral relationship, with food aid perhaps, or educational and developmental assistance. Maybe we could even make an offer the Nicaraguan Government that for each and every Soviet or Cuban technicians who leaves Nicaragua, the United States will supply two or three teachers, agronomists or health care professionals to replace them. The stick would be the understanding that if Nicaragua abridged that relationship or interfered with its neighbors' sovereignty, not only would affirmative aid be withdrawn, but this country would have to reconsider its position on what sort of military posture we might want to take in the future. The carrot and stick approach admittedly requires risk on the part of the President and the Congress, but we are clearly not finding success in the current policy. Nor does the military stick approach before us today offer anything near a risk-free resolution of the problems in the region.

Mr. Chairman, in the interest of affording the rest of my colleagues a chance to speak, I will bring my remarks to a close with two calls to oppose Contra aid from Kansas editorial writers. From a newspaper in my district come these comments:

The time has come to ensure that no American troops are sent to Nicaragua. This objective can best be achieved by deciding now that the Nicaraguan civil war no longer will be financed by the United States as an escalating prelude to military intervention. Military aid should end.

From another comes this conclusion, which I share:

The best hope for a solution in Nicaragua is a resumption of bilateral talks with Managua. Cooperation, patience and diplomacy are always superior to a narrow military course which is doomed to fail. The added benefit is that any solution that comes from diplomacy will increase American influence and prestige in the area, something a military solution definitely cannot do.

I hope these words and the comments from concerned Kansans will not fall on deaf ears.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS].

Mr. JEFFORDS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, U.S. policy toward Central America has preoccupied this body for a long time, and no doubt it will continue to do so for some time to come.

The divisions over that policy, however, are not as deep as they sound today. I'm sure that most of my colleagues share my concern over the current direction and policies of the Sandinista regime. Reports of Sandinista censorship of the press, forced conscription, mistreatment of prisoners, control of opposition political parties, and harassment of religious officials are all extremely disturbing. There is no doubt in my mind that the Sandinista leadership is guided by the principles of Marxism-Leninism, and looks to the socialist world for guidance. While the revolution of 1979 was a broad-based popular revolt against a hated dictator and in support of individual freedoms, the Sandinistas succeeded in consolidating their power, forcing out those people who did not agree with their vision of a new society.

I also sense general agreement among my colleagues that the Soviet and Cuban military presence cannot be ignored, nor can we sit back and allow the Soviet Union to establish a permanent base in Nicaragua from which to destabilize the hemisphere. Yes, Nicaragua is very close to the United States, and the historic and cultural ties between our two countries run deep. I understand the President's concern about the threat to our security from the proximity of a Soviet-backed regime. As we did in Grenada, we must draw a line over which we will not allow the Soviets to step.

Despite such concerns, I believe the majority of my colleagues realize that the Contras are an imperfect instrument of U.S. foreign policy. While the issue of human rights abuses is disputed by some, careful studies of the conflict show that the Contras continue to engage in gross violations of human rights, and that efforts to curb these atrocities have been largely unsuccessful.

Last month, my legislative director went to Nicaragua to investigate charges of human rights violations by both the Sandinistas and the Contras. Her report to me painted a very disturbing picture of the methods and objectives of the Contras. The Contras have not—and cannot—win the hearts and minds of the Nicaraguan people with such tactics, no matter what the policies of the Sandinista government. And not even the administration is claiming that $100 million from us will ensure victory for them.

The real issue before us now is, what do we do about this dilemma?

How do we bring pressure to bear on the Sandinista government to moderate its abusive policies and back down from its support for revolution in the hemisphere? How do we curtail the Soviet and Cuban influence and prevent the establishment of another Soviet base so near to our border? How can we ensure regional stability and promote economic development for our friends?

In the course of this debate, we will hear many answers to these questions. But there is no one solution to these problems—no quick fixes. What is very clear is that we must not continue a policy in Central America that goes against the very ideals of our Nation and alienates our friends on this continent and our allies abroad.

We have many alternatives other than military support for the Contras. The Contadora process has been reinvigorated and deserves our support. Diplomatic and economic pressures can be exerted and have proven effective—the most recent example being the Philippines. While I would not support a carrot approach without a stick, the Contras have not brought the Sandinista government any closer to military collapse or diplomatic negotiations. Economic tools might well succeed where military threat has failed.

We must remember that one of the strongest ways to bring pressure to bear on a troubled government is to provide its people with obvious and compelling examples of how democracy and free enterprise hold the only real promise of a better life for all members of society. A shining example of economic success would surely catch the attention of poverty-stricken Nicaragua. The Sandinista government would not be able to justify its policies to its people if their neighbors enjoy a substantially better standard of living and greater personal freedom. In short, we must not lose faith in the power and appeal of democracy.

The Latin American democracies are very fragile, and badly in need of technical and development assistance. Ever since the Kennedy Alliance for Progress Program, my own State of Vermont has been an active partner with Honduras, sharing technical knowledge, agricultural training, and basic health education. Honduras is now trying to solidify its new-found democracy, and is very troubled by the presence of the Contras on its southern border. Honduras is a desperately poor country. It does not have the resources to provide for the dislocated armed men and refugee families living along its border. Nor can it deal with unrest caused by the Contra presence. By focusing our attention on the evils of the Sandinistas, we have been ignoring the needs of our friends.

Our debate today will not be the final round over U.S. policy toward our nearest neighbors. Nor will our decisions over the next few months provide us with all the answers. We are destined to stay involved in the affairs of Latin America, whether by choice or necessity. Therefore, it is critical that our policies advance the ultimate objective of a free and prosperous hemisphere.

I strongly believe that this request for aid to the Contras takes us further from that end. This is a powerful country, but without wisdom, our power will bring us no closer to our goals.

I urge all of my colleagues to vote against this resolution.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH].

Mr. KASICH. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Let me just in my brief time try to capsulize why I feel so strongly about the issue. When constituents at home say, "Why do you feel you should support the President in Central America?" it is really fairly easy. I want to run through these points and be as concise as I possibly can and lead you to my conclusion. Since the Sandinista government has been in power the Soviet Union has given $600 million in military aid to the Sandinistas. Tanks: With that money the Soviets have also been able to give them tanks, 150 T-55 tanks, Which are used in the Warsaw Pact countries. If you go to Europe, look across the fence, there are T-55 tanks that the Soviets use in Eastern Europe to maintain control and for repression.

Armored personnel carriers: 200 armored personnel carriers along with one mechanized infantry brigade provided by the Soviet Union.

Artillery: The artillery within Nicaragua controlled by the Sandinistas is the largest in Central America. They have a 96-pound shell that they can shoot 11 miles, provided by the Soviet Union.

□ 1845

The Hind-D helicopter: We all know about the Hind-D helicopter because it has been the most effective instrument of terror used in Afghanistan today against the freedom fighters. That is why now the opposition, the freedom fighters in Afghanistan, have weapons designed to shoot down Hind-D helicopters. We do not have that with the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

High-performance jets: The world held its breath when we thought that there were perhaps crates of high-performance jets put onto ships that were moving into the harbors in Nicaragua. But we do know that the Sandinistas themselves have been trained in Cuba and in Bulgaria in the use of high-performance jets.

The airport: The airport at Punta Huete has a 10,000-foot runway. It rivals many of the runways in many of the strategic airports that we have in the United States. In fact, as the chairman of the Armed Services Committee knows, it can accommodate the use of bear bombers, Soviet bear bombers with intercontinental capability.

Personnel: Cubans, there are 3,000 military advisers from Cuba, some out in the field fighting; 4,500 civilian Cubans who are there to construct military installations.

U.S.S.R.: 200 military advisers, perhaps as many as 1,000 civilians.

East Germans: 70 advisers from East Germany who are experts in internal security and putting down repression.

From Bulgaria: We have 80 military advisers from Bulgaria who are training Nicaraguans in the way in which you fly Mig's over in Bulgaria. There is a factory devoted to producing rifle ammunition that will fit M-16 rifles that were captured in Vietnam that are being used by Communist guerrillas in El Salvador to try to destroy the democratic government in El Salvador.

Libya: There are $400 million in grants and loans and 800 advisers. And listen to what Colonel Qadhafi says about his friends, the Sandinistas: "Libyan fighters, arms, and backing to the Nicaraguan people."

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire as to how much time on both sides of the aisle?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 12 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Arizona has 21 minutes remaining.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Ms. FIEDLER].

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, I spent the entire day on the floor listening to the arguments on both sides, and I cannot honestly say that I came to this floor without having made up my mind first, but the longer I sat here, the more I am convinced that my personal view in support of the President's $100 million aid package is the view that should be supported by the overwhelming majority of the Members of this House.

When you take a look at what we are able to do in this country, what rights and privileges we have, and what our service here in the U.S. Congress represents, one is struck by the tremendous responsibility we hold. I often reflect upon how I can contribute in a positive way to the betterment of not only the people of this country, but of the world. Personally, I have two fundamental goals that I would like to achieve as a Member of the U.S. Congress and, hopefully, as a Member of the U.S. Senate.

One is to strengthen our economic base, and the other is to ensure that our people remain free.

I personally believe very strongly that unless we are willing to support the side that is trying to expand democracy in Central America, we are going to pay an enormously high price. And while each of us has to search our conscience for the decision which we feel is in the best interests of our constituents and our country, I do not see how anyone can look at this situation and not recognize the tremendous threat that a Communist Nicaragua poses to our Nation.

I have to look at it not so much as what are we going to do in Nicaragua. I have to ask myself the question: What would I do if this was Mexico instead of Nicaragua? For me there is no question. I would vote for the aid, because living in southern California, we see the tremendous impact of the instability in Central America by the constant inflow of aliens and political refugees coming over the border. They are making decisions to come into our country because there is enormous instability in that part of the world, because their freedoms are threatened.

For us to make a decision here which will permit the continuous repression of people in Central America, means that we are making the least possible statement of support for their democratic rights as individuals.

Comments were made earlier in the day regarding whether or not there had been repression of the Jewish community in Nicaragua. Let me tell you that I have spoken personally to one of the people who was in the synagogue the day that it was set on fire, and the entire Jewish community's lives were put at risk. This kind of repression is something which is ongoing not only for the Jewish community which fortunately has managed to escape almost to the last person, but also to the Miskito Indians and the people who are part of the Catholic Church, because religious expression is inconsistent with communism. The Sandinistas simply do not want to see any independent religious influence in Nicaragua that competes with their propaganda and opposes their repression. The Soviet Union and, of course, from the Jewish community viewpoint, the PLO's influence in Nicaragua are also factors which we have to recognize.

It is not just a matter of what I am saying or what the Antidefamation League says here regarding what has happened to the Jewish community in Nicaragua, but also other statements made by Newsweek, where it says "PLO on the wing in Nicaragua," talking about the PLO's influence in that part of the world, Qadhafi's influence, and, of course, the latest article which is in the Boston Herald titled "Law, Leave the Church Alone." It is a statement by the Roman Catholic Cardinals Bernard F. Lau of Boston and John O'Connor of New York talking about religious repression in Nicaragua.

There are very serious problems there. If we do nothing, we are going to face continued expansion of Soviet domination in our hemisphere. It will cost not only lives, but will cost an enormous amount of jobs in our country and eventually it could erode the freedom of the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, it saddens me very much that there are those who can look at the situation and really hope that talk is going to change it. Believe me, talk did not change it in Hungary, it did not change it in Poland, it has not changed it in Afghanistan, and it is not going to change it in Central America either.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. FIEDLER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentlewoman yielding.

Mr. Chairman, let me just say that in a statement that was published in the New Republic:

> A highly militarized, highly disciplined country with by far the largest army in Central America with ideological ambitions stretching far beyond its border supported by Cubans and Soviets is bound to be a source of instability in the region of a weak and fledgling democracy is clearly what we have in Central America.

Let us not let them destroy the fragile democracies that are building throughout Central and South America today.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, if no one in this House chooses to criticize the Sandinistas, it is very apparent that tomorrow we will see an overwhelming victory for the President's package.

Why? Simply because there is only one hope in the region. They may not be perfect, but the Contras are in fact our one hope.

Today there continues be two revolutions taking place in Nicaragua. One is the revolution we have been hearing about here, a revolution without borders, which is the one that is trying to continue to encroach into the Western Hemisphere in an even broader way. As the President said very clearly Sunday evening, it was most eloquently put by Libyan leader Mu'ammar Qadhafi, who said, "Nicaragua is a great thing. It is fighting America at its doorstep."

The second revolution is the one that began in the 1970's, and it is the one which, unfortunately, did not end in 1979 with the overthrow of Anastasio Somoza. It is one that continues today with the people of Nicaragua.

□ 1855

It is the revolution which continues to have that basic four-point platform, nonalignment, an end to human rights violations, a continued free and fair government, and a democratic elections process. Those are the four basic points that the people were trying to attain back in 1979, and it is what the people are continuing to look for today.

Throughout this debate President John F. Kennedy has been quoted. But when you look at the region of Central America, probably his best quote was the one that was delivered in his inaugural address in 1961. He said.

> Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, to assure the survival and the success of liberty.

I urge my colleagues to make that statement stick. Support the President when we have our vote tomorrow.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been in this body for 11 years, and this is the first time since I have been here that I cannot talk. I cannot talk on this issue because it disturbs me so much and I become so emotional as I do.

I am concerned not about Nicaragua. I am concerned about us. I am concerned about our country. What kind of values do we have in our country? Do we believe that the way we should try to settle arguments is to grab our guns? Or do we believe that maybe what we should try to do is to talk and see if we can settle it with other means?

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. No, I will not yield. I have heard all that over and over again. Somebody better start to say what are values that matter. Somebody better start to say: Does it matter whether we grab guns or whether we try to settle our problems? I will not yield to the gentleman. I have heard all that palaver too much.

Mr. Chairman, as in the past, our debate today centers around what we here in Congress believe to be the best U.S. foreign policy alternative toward Nicaragua. In my view, this foreign policy alternative must address both the long-term national security interests of the United States, and serve the growing cause of democracy in Central America. The elements of this policy are not mutually exclusive. Rather, they are complimentary. Today, we must determine whether the foreign policy path the President has plotted for us—$100 million in assistance to the Contras—serves both the long-term national security interests of the United States and the cause of democracy in Central America, or whether that foreign policy path does not serve those interests.

Mr. Chairman, in my view the path plotted for us on Sunday evening does not serve the long-term national security interests of the United States or the cause of democracy in Central America. I have visited Nicaragua. I have seen there, first hand, the failures of the Sandinista government, as well as the failures of a U.S. foreign policy that seeks to make that government cry, "uncle," at the hands of the Contras. I am certainly no fan of the Sandinista government, nor am I a fan of the Contras. But it seems obvious to me that the Sandinista government has not cried "uncle," and in my opinion, it is not about to. It seems obvious to me that with or without U.S. support, the Contras are incapable of defeating the Sandinista government. The Contras have no popular support, control no indigenous Nicaraguan territory and are dubious allies to the cause of democracy. Further, continued commitment to the Contras only isolates the United States from our friends and allies in this hemisphere, and runs the risk of drawing us slowly and inexorably toward direct military confrontation with Nicaragua.

I believe the Congress shares many of the President's policy objectives in Central America. Like the President, I believe we support implementation of a foreign policy toward Nicaragua that deters and blunts Soviet, Cuban, and Eastern bloc influence in Central America. Similarly, I believe we support implementation of a foreign policy toward Central America that protects the peoples of Central America from the tyrannies of rightwing or leftwing repression. Finally I am sure we are all encouraged by the growth of democratic governments and institutions in Central and South America. Where I believe many of us disagree with the President, however, is in the construction of a policy toward Nicaragua and Central America as a whole that relies upon the application of military solutions to what most experts believe to be socioeconomic problems. Thus, our long-term national security interests, as well as our support for the continued development and strengthening of democratic governments and institutions in Central America, are related more to how we go about helping our Central American friends and allies solve the socioeconomic problems that confront them, than they are to the success or failure of the Contras.

I believe we must develop a creative policy toward Central America that solves socioeconomic problems that confront Central America. Similarly, I believe we must develop a creative policy toward Nicaragua. In developing this policy, I believe we must pay heed to our hemispheric friends and allies who are encouraging us to foresake a reactive military policy that isolates the United States from our hemispheric friends and allies and instead, rely upon a creative, multilateral, diplomatic policy that allows us to work in concert with our friends and allies in seeking a negotiated solution to the problems we face in Central America.

I believe we can achieve and implement such a policy by rejecting President Reagan's request for $100 million in funding for the Contras. I believe we can achieve and implement such a policy by relying upon the Contadora peace initiative, an initiative President Reagan has said that he supports. In my view, a firm U.S. commitment to the Contadora peace initiative recognizes traditional U.S. interests in being a true and honest partner with our hemispheric friends and allies, working together, toward a common solution. A solution that moves us away from military confrontation and toward promotion of economic stability, social reform, and democratic pluralism. Under such circumstances, Soviet, Cuban, and Eastern bloc influence is minimized. Under such circumstances, a negotiated end to all hostilities in Central America becomes feasible. Under such circumstances, the Nicaraguan people would realize the attractive elements of United States foreign policy and power. Under such circumstances, the Sandinistas are put into a position of learning to live with Nicaragua's neighbors or live in isolation from both them and their people. Under such circumstances, the long-term national security interests of the United States and our commitment to the growing cause of democracy in Central America are served.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP].

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Chairman, I was on the floor listening to my colleague from Iowa speak about the deep emotion and concern that he has about how, this issue can be resolved without guns or violence. All of us share deeply in the desire for peace and freedom in Central America and throughout the world.

History has something to say to us today, as we, the elected Representatives of the American people, are facing a very difficult decision tomorrow, as the gentleman pointed out.

Paul Johnson, in his great book "Modern Times," which chronicles the history of the 1900's, said the twin evils of this century are the Holocaust and the Gulag Archipelago. Nazism and communism are the twin evils of our day. And one cannot turn his back on evil without being evil, as Elie Wiesel reminds us.

I believe that there are moments of opportunity lost and won where responsible people determine the course of history. Charles Krauthammer, in the Washington Post the other day, wrote that, "compromise or not, if in the end the Contras are cut off, the reason ultimately will be fear—fear of another Vietnam." Turning away, for fear of becoming involved, will not bring peace or freedom, it will not bring us the blessing of neutrality. "We can look back on another act taken in fear, the Neutrality Acts of the 1930's, and see how misguided and futile they were as a response to German and Japanese militarism. Closing our eyes did not preserve peace. It brought on the Holocaust, it brought on the murder of 6 million Jews. It brought on the beaches of Dunkirk. Have we not learned the lesson of history? To turn our back on an evil with indifference is evil. There is no neutrality.

We were elected by the people of this country to face this responsibility. I am from Buffalo, he is from Arizona, you are from New York, you are from Wisconsin. We are elected for these votes. This is why we are here. We are not here for any other reason than to take tough stands on tough issues when there are great moral questions at stake.

Let me tell you about that final Neutrality Act in 1937. Fascist Italy had attacked Abyssinia, and everyone in the West said, "Who cares about Abyssinia? Those people are in northern Africa. They are not Jeffersonian Democrats."

Did anybody ask the question what was happening to Abyssinia or what was happening to the Rhineland when Nazi Germany invaded, in violation of the Versailles Treaty, and began to rearm, and everybody said, "It is too far away, it is in Europe, don't worry about that, it doesn't really matter"? Or when the Nuremberg laws were passed that ultimately resulted in the Holocaust and the Nazi concentration camps at Bergen Belsen and Dachau and Buchenwald, and on and on and on?

Do you know what the Congress did in 1937? It passed the Neutrality Act. It sat over here, while Europe was in flames and northern Africa was being bombarded by Fascist airplanes. We said, "We declare neutrality." That encouraged Hitler, that encouraged the Holocaust.

The true challenge of our responsibility as Members of the 99th Congress is to look forward, and to recognize that a Neutrality Act in 1986 cannot protect us against the dangers inherent in Soviet subversion and military expansion today. On the contrary, the answer to staying out of war, the answer to resolving this issue is to support those men and women who are fighting for freedom in this hemisphere. Indeed, these are the same reasons we are supporting freedom fighters in Afghanistan, freedom fighters in Kampuchea. As the Representative from Ohio pointed out a little bit earlier, some of us think we should support the freedom fighters in Angola, as well.

But to close our eyes to what is happening in Central America, to think that we are going to bring peace in our time by turning our backs on the Contras, is an act of neutrality from which we cannot escape the history books.

I ask you tomorrow to think about this issue in terms of the lesson of history and not turn our backs on the cause of democracy and freedom in our hemisphere.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Just let me start off by saying I am absolutely convinced that it is only by involving directly all the concerned nations of Latin America that we are going to finally resolve this problem.

I have heard today that Nicaragua is at our back door. Well, if it is at our back door, it is at Central America's front door. And yet of every one of those nations, not one government has come to us and asked us or sent any communication to us to support the Contras.

Once again we find ourselves in a situation where big brother up north is telling Spanish-speaking America how they should behave and how they should act.

Let me say to all of my colleagues here, as a person with the surname of Garcia, Rodriguez, and Gonzalez, I am sometimes resentful. I am not an admirer of Ortega. I do not think he represents the people of Nicaragua. I think he has turned out to be a person whom we should, in all honesty, try somehow in a democratic fashion to get rid of. But the $100 million that the President has asked the American people to come forward with I think is the wrong way to go.

I would like to take this time to thank the millions of people who have called and have sent cables to this building and to the Members of the House and the Senate and thank them, because the overwhelming response has been against aid to the Contras. I want to thank you, America, because I think that this is what this democracy is all about.

So I say to my colleagues that tomorrow is a crucial vote. Do you know what? We are not going to solve a thing. We are not going to solve a thing. One of us may win a battle, but the big war, in terms of how Central America and Spanish-speaking America directs itself will not be determined by this Chamber, it will be determined by the people who live in those countries. If we want to help them, send $100 million let us help them to build their economy, let us help them to show the Sandinistas in the surrounding countries that in fact by building their economy that they in fact will turn back communism.

Let me say, in closing, that there are those of us in this Chamber who have fought the Communists. There are those who fought in two separate wars, in Korea and in Vietnam. As one of those participants, I can tell you that I am totally and 100 percent against communism. But what we are doing in Central America is wrong.

Vote "no."

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. McCAIN] has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN] has 7 minutes remaining.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH].

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, this has been a long day of debate. Both sides have probably said in a variety of ways about all they know, in general, about their feelings. And I guess, as we come to a close, I want to focus on the notion that, in the end, this is not a debte about Nicaragua, it is not even a debate about the Soviet Empire and a threat to America. This is primarily a debate over America's view of the world and America's view of its own responsibilities.

Yesterday, in a pattern which has been going on for 2 weeks and which was repeated several times today, a friend of ours on the left jumped up and talked about his concern about patriotism being questioned. He then went on to say something that I think is very revealing. After the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] had made a 1-minute speech, our friend on the left jumped up and said, "Mr. Speaker, I request the gentleman's words be taken down. He is questioning the judgment of other Members of this House."

He then repeated, "He questions the judgment of the Members of the House who oppose the Reagan proposition."

He then said, finally, "Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do, because it followed a statement that I just made where I indicated that I oppose the President's position, and certainly by inference he is questioning my judgment, and I resent it."

Now, I would suggest to anyone who wants to read page 5200 that that is the essence of what we are saying and why this debate is at some level so emotional.

I believe every friend I have in this House on the left is a sincere patriot. But what is at argument in this room tonight, what will be voted on tomorrow, on the anniversary of the "Dear Commandante" letter, is a question of judgment about the nature of reality and about the fact that on the left we have no effective strategy for dealing with communism.

Now, I think the Reagan proposal has problems with it. I think we have a lot to do at the CIA, I think we have a lot to do at the Defense Department. I have been part of commissions to reform defense. I do not think this administration has solved the problem. But at least this administration is standing up to the fact that Soviet-Cuban colonial advisers dominating a country in Latin America is a real threat.

I have heard my friends on the left say, "I don't like the Sandinistas."

This is not a beauty contest. If the Nicaraguan Communists are a threat to America, I say to my friends on the left, what are you going to do about it?

I have had three different Members on the left debate me in the last few days on television and, pushed to the wall, each of the three said, "Well, if things get bad enough, we can send in the Marines."

I was stunned all three times.

Can you honestly in your heart say that it is a more prudent gamble with our children's lives to vote "no" tomorrow on $100 million because your backup plan is you will send them down to Nicaragua to clean out the Communists?

And I have had three Members on your side say that on television.

The fact is that we are trapped in a historic tragedy that goes all the way back to Vietnam, and you know it. The fact is that for almost 20 years we have been having the same argument about communism, ever since John F. Kennedy was killed, and nobody on the left had the ability, the will or the courage to morally dominate the isolationist-pacifist wing represented by George McGovern. The fact is, as the New York Times' Fox Butterfield, 1983, in "The New Vietnam Scholarship" says flatly: "Just before the Paris peace accords in 1973, scholars now say, the United States was in a stronger position than it realized. Had aid been continued, South Vietnam might have survived."

□ 1910

Now, the gentleman may laugh. Every major scholar who has looked at that issue comes down on the same side. Congress cut off aid and then South Vietnam collapsed.

Now, I can understand the concept psychologically of cognitive dissonance. I can understand that people who have voted wrong for 16 years, who were wrong about South Vietnam and watched it become a dictatorship and watched the boat people flee, who were wrong about Cambodia and watched "The Killing Fields," who were wrong in Ethiopia and watched the death which continues to this day, who were wrong about the Sandinistas, and I can find you quote after quote after quote. It turns out they were Communists. It turns out they did dupe us. It turns out they did systematically lie to us.

I can find you the quotes in the Granada documents where they said to themselves, "We can always lie to the Americans. They will always believe."

Let me just close by saying, we vote tomorrow not as Republicans or Democrats, we vote as Americans and we vote not just for ourselves, but for history.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PEASE].

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, I will oppose aid to the Contras.

I agree with President Reagan that the Sandinista government in Nicaragua is a Marxist, authoritarian regime which has betrayed the ideals of the revolution against Somoza.

I believe, however, that President Reagan grossly exaggerates the danger which Nicaragua poses to other Western Hemisphere nations.

Further, the President seriously misleads the American people when he refers to the Contras as freedom fighters seeking to restore democracy in Nicaragua. The Contra military leadership is anti-Communist, but it is not democratic by any means.

The President justifies Contra aid on the basis of Nicaraguan plans to subvert and conquer Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras, Guatamala, and Mexico, yet the leaders of all those nations oppose military aid to the Contras.

All of the leaders favor instead intensive negotiations to achieve a regional peace and nonaggression plan. Our course, I believe, should be to fully support those regional negotiations.

Opposing Contra aid is a vote for the negotiated settlement which the nations of Central America want. Supporting Contra aid would be a vote for the first $100 million of what I believe would become a multi-billion-dollar way which would eventually see American soldiers fighting in Nicaragua.

Two specific points:

First, I'm told that the President's proposal would repeal all existing restrictions on U.S. intelligence agencies and the Defense Department in aiding the Contras.

If this resolution passes, the CIA will be back in business in short order—training the Contras, serving as "bag men" with millions of dollars, directing the Contras, fighting alongside the Contras, putting out manuals on how to assassinate opposition leaders.

Second, on Sunday evening I heard President Reagan tell the American people that the $100 million for the Contras would not cost the taxpayers any extra money because the money would be transferred from funds already appropriated for the Pentagon.

Today I was informed that the President is expected at some later point to ask Congress to approve supplemental funds for the Pentagon.

What does this mean? It means no free lunch. We are going to pay and pay for our intervention in Nicaragua.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, it has been a very long day. A few of us have been here since early this morning and I would like to take a moment to thank the Chair for the extreme courtesy and fairness with which the gentleman from North Carolina has presided over this debate. I know all of us share that view.

I would like, Mr. Chairman, to make a few points that have been made here today. There is a common thread, I do not know if it was the Republican and Democrat primer that brought up the same issues, but I would like in the very short time remaining to run through them.

First of all, the GAO report. I am on the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee. I questioned the person from the General Accounting Office and his statement to me was that the State Department did the best they could. We have passed a law that does not allow the State Department to track the funds all the way through and I think it is ludicrous for us to expect an audit trail into Nicaragua when all Americans are prohibited from being there.

The next point is that the Contras hold no part of the country, they do not hold a town or city or any significant part of the country. Indeed, they do not, nor do the Mujahadeen in Afghanistan. I have heard of no motion to cut off aid to the freedom fighters in Afghanistan and I would submit that aid has been cut off for the last 16 months in Nicaragua, it would be very difficult for them to fight without the kinds of equipment that we are seeking to provide them with this bill that is coming up.

Human rights violations—we all deplore the human rights violations and I can tell you that one part of this debate I think was a bit of a waste of time, the charges and countercharges and the lists of human rights violations on both sides, because it is very difficult to account for.

I would also point out that one of the greatest tragedies of warfare is human rights violations. We can go throughout our own history from a place like Andersonville and Mylai, the march from Atlanta to the sea and others where terrible human rights violations were inflicted.

I would suggest that possibly there would be a cessation or a lessening of human rights violations on the part of the freedom fighters if we had been able to give them the proper training.

Negotiations—we all want negotiations. We also remember in 1968 the frenzy for negotiations between ourselves and the North Vietnamese. Unfortunately, we began negotiations without any other pressures to bring about a settlement or a solution to that unhappy conflict and negotiations continued without any progress for the next 5 years until the B-52's came in Christmas of 1952.

Jose Napoleon Duarte I think a few days ago said it adequately when he said that he would be willing to negotiate with his guerrillas or rebels that are fighting in his country if the Sandinistas would negotiate with those in his.

The reason he gave was he said, "I cannot solve my problem until the problem in Nicaragua is solved." I think that statement is very clear.

Will $100 million do the job? I do not know if $100 million will do the job and I do not know how many school lunches $100 million will buy, although I am sure I will be told before the debate is over; but I do know we just voted on a voice vote $250 million to Ireland without a single dissenting vote or request.

I am running short of time. I would like to summarize by saying that TIP O'NEILL, our Speaker, said the other day and was quoted in the press, "The shadows of Vietnam have not left us."

Indeed that is true, Mr. Chairman. The shadows of Vietnam are with us and it is time we left the shadows of Vietnam and took our stand for freedom and those who are fighting for freedom throughout the world without sending American men to do that job.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOGLIETTA].

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the bill before us today, which would provide direct financial assistance to the Contra insurgency in Nicaragua.

I am no more a fan of the Sandinista government of Nicaragua than those who support this legislation. Nor do I question that there are many serious problems of human rights violations and political and press freedoms in Nicaragua. Where I part company with those who advocate aid is on the question of the violent overthrow of the Sandinistas. Is it our right to create and prop up an artifical insurgency? No, it is not. Is it appropriate for the United States to undertake to destabilize and remove a sovereign government who's abuses are no more severe than those of many governments we provide money to keep in power? No, it is not. Is there any convincing evidence that what we are doing has any prospect for improving the lot of the average Nicaraguan? No, there is not. Are we, in fact, even concerned about the average Nicaraguan in this debate? I do not think so.

We are concerned with expansionism, with Communist influence and domination of the Central American and Carribean region. That is an appropriate concern. But we must reevaluate how to address that concern. The Contra movement has not contained or controlled the Sandinistas, or acted to force them to behave. Indeed, it has led to the rapid growth of the Sandinistas military, to the expansion of the Soviet and Cuban influence in Central America and to the consolidation, not the deterioration of power by those people which our President opposes. That is hardly a wise path to walk down. It does not further our aims. It defeats them. It does not concern itself with democracy in Central America, it ignores it. If anything, the current program of the executive branch, articulated and expanded by the $100 million folly before us today, serves only to make it clear that in our zealousness to unseat a government we don't like we are forgetting our purposes. Stability in the Western Hemisphere will not be enhanced by funding this movement. Democracy in Nicaragua won't come through funding the Contras. More aid will lead to more Cubans and more Soviets and more consolidation. We have no business funding the Contras, and the time has come to stop.

Mr. COMBEST. Mr. Chairman, the importance of this vote is beyond question. There will be no second chance. We are dealing with basic fundamentals in this resolution: Fundamental precepts of our heritage in liberty; fundamental questions about our support for freedom in our own hemisphere, and fundamental challenges for the United States in meeting Soviet and terrorist aggression in the future.

Hope is at stake with this resolution: The hopes of the Nicaraguan people to live in freedom and democracy; and the hopes of the people of Central America to live in peace, free from Communist subversion. And, finally, the very security of the United States is at stake.

John Stuart Mill said:

The doctrine of nonintervention, to be a legitimate principle of morality, must be accepted by all governments. The despots must consent to be bound to it as well as the free states. Unless they do, the profession of it by free countries comes but to this miserable issue—that the wrong side may help the wrong, but the right must not help the right.

That is exactly where Congress' actions have brought us today. The Soviets can help their clients, but the U.S. Congress prevents us from helping the forces of democracy.

Calls for more diplomacy in place of military aid are at best simplistic when we all know that the Communist Sandinistas will only negotiate when it is in their best interest to do so. Since 1979, the Sandinistas have received over $500 million in military assistance from Cuba and the Soviet bloc. Last year, while we sent meager supplies of boots and bandages, the Soviets sent tanks, attack helicopters, and ammunition. Why should they bargain when we will eliminate their only opposition for them?

The Contras' cause is a just one—the same cause pursued by freedom fighters in Texas 150 years ago and Afghanistan today.

And I think Texans have a special understanding for the threat a Communist Nicaragua poses to the United States. The prospect of millions of refugees fleeing to the United States, and the turmoil so close to home created by Communist arms and agents is chilling. The presence of Lybian, PLO, Red Brigade, and other terrorists literally at our back door is of even greater concern. For once, we have a chance to stop a terrorist base before people start dying. Why do we hesitate?

We have seen a lot of namecalling and indignation these past few days and weeks. It seems to make some in this body uncomfortable to raise the possibilities of where their inaction will take us. Well, it should make them uncomfortable, for if they succeed in preventing aid from reaching those struggling in Nicaragua, millions in Central America will suffer the consequences as will the very cause of freedom.

Too many of those in this body who profess to be the guardians of our ideals have instead become the architects of our retreat.

We are now at a key time when we will decide with our votes whether we will sit by and let Soviet helicopters put down any chance for freedom and democracy in Nicaragua. We will decide with our votes whether we will strangle the democratic resistance whose members are willing to give their lives in pursuit of liberty if we'll just give them the support they need.

Our decision cannot be made lightly, nor should it be made with an eye toward a second chance or a so-called compromise down the road. As the Kissinger Commission noted, there may be an argument for doing nothing; there may be an argument for doing a great deal more; but there is no logical argument for giving some aid but not enough.

The time is now. We decide today if we will put the noose around the freedom fighters' necks so that the Sandinistas can pull the rope.

Let us all remember that a Communist regime has never peacefully relinquished power. Today we decide with our votes if we are willing to live with this threat on our border. Today we decide with our votes if we are willing to stand by those who are willing to fight and die for our principles.

There is a heavy burden of responsibility on us, for our decision will go far in defining what will confront future Presidents and Congresses in this hemisphere. I fervently hope that we are up to the task.

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Chairman, here we go again! Another ultimatum on Nicaragua from President Reagan. This time, if we don't come up with $100 million to help the Contras overthrow the legally elected and accredited Sandinista Government, then democracy, as we know it, "dies" in Nicaragua and is fatally wounded in the rest of the Western Hemisphere.

Fortunately, Mr. Chairman, the administration's determination to use military aid to make the Sandinistas "cry uncle" is not shared by others in the hemisphere.

Not a single, democratic government in this hemisphere has supported military aid for the Contras, and just this week I received a letter from the Honorable Edward Broadbent, a Member of the Canadian House of Commons and the leader of the New Democratic Party, urging me to oppose the President's request.

I agree totally with Mr. Broadbent's assessment:

That giving military support to the "Contras" is profoundly wrong. There is no indication that the government of Nicaragua has hostile intentions towards any nation or group in the region. Whether one agrees or disagrees with the priorities of the existing government in Nicaragua, it is completely wrong in terms of international law and morality to finance military action against a government that is internationally recognized.

I commend Mr. Broadbent's letter to the attention of my colleagues for its insights and for their consideration:

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Canada, March 10, 1986.

Hon. GEORGE W. CROCKETT, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE CROCKETT, JR.: It is with great concern for peace in our hemisphere that I write to you regarding the situation in Nicaragua. Canadians from all walks of life have been contacting me in increasing numbers about the continued conflict on the Honduras/Nicaragua border and about the reaction proposed by President Reagan.

It seems that President Reagan is proposing to provide military funding to the "Contras" just at a time when real peaceful solutions are at hand. Countries throughout Central America and South America are extremely serious about finding a mechanism to bring peace to the region. The support for a non-violent solution to problems in the region is visibly increasing in statements by governments in the area and from around the world.

I believe that giving military support to the Contras is profoundly wrong. There is no indication that the government of Nicaragua has hostile intentions towards any nation or group in the region. Whether one agrees or disagrees with the priorities of the existing government in Nicaragua, it is completely wrong in terms of international law and morality to finance military action against a government that is internationally recognized.

It is an extremely rare step for all our elected Members to take such action as to write directly to members of your Congress. In fact, it is being done for the first time. However, it is our strong view that the provisions of direct "Contra" military aid, as suggested by your President, will dangerously escalate the conflict. It constitutes a major incursion upon the rights of another nation.

Our concern at this time is to inform you of our understanding of the situation and to assure you that we believe politically sound peaceful solution is within reach. An escalation of violence is not only morally offensive but practically counter-productive.

I respectfully urge you for the sake of both justice and peace in the western hemisphere to refuse your President's request and urge you to pursue the route suggested by the Contadora Process. In writing, I am acting on behalf of all the elected New Democratic Party Members of Parliament.

Yours sincerely,

EDWARD BROADBENT.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, we should not send military or humanitarian aid to the Contra revolutionaries in Nicaragua. The issue is: Do you want peace or war in Central America. Sending aid, any aid, is a vote to fund war, killing, and bloodshed.

For over 5 years the Contras have been marauding in Nicaragua. What have they accomplished? The Contras have spent millions of dollars of U.S. taxpayer's money alienating the Nicaraguan citizenry with their barbaric acts. What they have not done is generated a popular uprising against the Sandinistas. What they have not done is inspired the Nicaraguan people into backing their cause. We should not be sending $100 million to finance a policy that is clearly failing.

I do not agree with everything the Sandinista government in Nicaragua does. But that does not justify the violent overthrow of the government. This is not, in spite of President Reagan's assertions and questionable rhetoric, the frontlines in the battle against communism. In fact, by providing aid to the Contras we could be doing what President Reagan fears most, driving the Nicaraguan Government into the hands of the Communists. They would have nowhere else to turn.

We must pursue the process of peace. Frameworks for negotiations exist in both the Contadora and Caraballeda proposals. These frameworks are backed by 13 Latin American nations including Panama and Mexico. President Reagan's idea of peace negotiations is to send delegations to Central America that on numerous occasions did not even go to Nicaragua.

The House of Representatives needs to send a clear signal. We want the peace process to work in Central America. We are not Contras.

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Chairman, in voting in favor of this request to extend additional assistance to the Contras, I have at bottom decided to give the President the benefit of the doubt in the only choice the House Democratic leadership has given us—$100 million of military and nonmilitary aid or no aid at all. But I do have doubts, and I would have preferred to have a wider range of choices.

No issue in recent memory has generated more public response than the issue of aid to the Contras. My constituents are as deeply divided as they are deeply concerned. The national debate over this issue has so polarized public opinion that I question whether this aid program will be sustained over any period of time. Whatever policy the United States adopts, it should have promise of being followed not only by this administration but its successors.

Members on both sides of the aisle have expressed their concerns about the internal behavior of the Nicaraguan Government, as well as the tendency of the Sandinistas to export the revolution. Concerns have also been raised about the nature and prior conduct of the Contras. Internal political reconciliation in Nicaragua and a viable regional agreement are clearly in the best interest of the United States. Continued Nicaraguan support of guerrilla movements in Central and South America does little to promote such a resolution to the problem, and continued Contra aid will signal our resolve to stop such Sandinista activities outside their borders.

Partisan divisions may produce a scapegoat but not a solution. Having worked last year toward a bipartisan approach to our Nicaraguan policy, I am painfully aware how hard it is to achieve and sustain. Nonetheless, should it prove possible to arrive at such a policy, I hope that it would be based on sustainability, strong support for the Contadora process, active steps to interdict the flow of arms from Nicaragua into other Central and South American countries and have the support of Nicaragua's neighbors.

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Chairman, the importance of tomorrow's vote on whether the American people should send $100 million to arm the Contras cannot be overstated. With this single vote we will set the course for American policy in this hemisphere for decades to come. And our choices are clear.

We can choose to work with all the other democratic nations in the Americas or we can set out on a course that isolates us from our friends and allies.

We can increase the threat of violence—violence that will certainly spread—and leave the Sandinistas no choice but to deepen their dependence on Soviet and Cuban military support or, we can seek to reduce militarism in Central America.

We can actively support the negotiations of the Contadora group—negotiations that seek to establish democratic governments and reduce foreign intervention in Central America—or we can support a course that promises prolonged confrontation.

If we send $100 million to the Contras, there will be no turning back. We would have burned our bridges and committed the United States to a war that does not need to be fought and that cannot be won without the loss of American lives. And, if we decide to pursue a military option, the first victim will be the chance for a negotiated peace.

Mexico, Colombia, Panama, Venezuela, Brazil, Argentina, Peru, and Uruguay have committed themselves to negotiations that would:

First, halt the flow of weapons into Central America;

Second, reduce the presence of foreign military advisers;

Third, cut the size of the armed forces in the region;

Fourth, create a mechanism to support democratic pluralism; and Fifth, adopt measures to promote economic advances.

The U.S. support for arms will destroy any hope of achieving these goals. Instead, we will become isolated and, as the charges of "Yankee Imperialism" increase in a region that has long resented America's "Big Stick" interventionsm, we will increase the likelihood that other nations will follow the path of the Sandinistas.

Our choice is clear. We can use our intellect and stand with the Contadora group and seek to reduce the tension and antagonism in Central America. Or, we can provide arms and ammuntion to the remnants of Somoza's feared National Guard and start down an endless path of war.

I favor using our intellect. Last year, President Reagan said that if the Congress provided $27 million in aid to the Contras it would force the Sandinistas to negotiate. A month after that aid was approved, the administration failed to resume bilateral negotiations and, a month later, in August, President Reagan stated flatly that there would be no negotiated settlement.

Once again, the President is saying that aid to the Contras will help force negotiations. Well, I believe that just the opposite is true. A vote against the $100 million aid to the Contras is a vote for the Contadora plan. The efforts of those countries that share a common language, culture, and interest hold our greatest hope for peace in Central America.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to House Joint Resolution 540, to approve the President's request for $100 million for the Contras fighting to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. This is a huge, nearly fourfold increase in funding for the Contras since the first request 5 years ago for $19 million. If this request is granted, it will surely not be the last.

We are all well aware that the Sandinista government is repressive and has a continuing record of human rights violations, and no one wants a continuation and strengthening of a Marxist-Leninist regime in Central America. But the Contras have also committed brutal atrocities and, led by military strongmen from the Somoza national guard, they do not represent a viable or acceptable alternative to the Sandinistas. They do not inspire a popular, democratic movement inside Nicaragua, but instead spread terror and hatred among the innocent campesinos.

Equally important is the message from the leaders of the eight leading countries in the region who urged a halt to aid to the Contras. These neighbors of Nicaragua believe the only effective solution is through negotiation. It is time we give peace a chance and vigorously support the Contadora process.

This continued funding of the Contras, I am convinced, would be counterproductive and should be disapproved. Apart from the fact that we should not be aiding an ineffective group of men who spread violence and brutality throughout the countryside, I am appalled that this should be asked at a time when the President is proposing deep cuts in vital programs providing nutrition, health, education, job training, and other services to our disadvantaged and vulnerable citizens. Under the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1987, 27,000 low-income women, infants, and children would be removed from the WIC nutrition program. Under his budget, student financial aid programs would be reduced by $1.9 billion, eliminating 2 million students from assistance. Under his proposed budget, funding for the National Institutes of Health would be cut by $417 million from the fiscal year 1986 appropriation and frozen at this lower level through fiscal year 1991.

It is inconceivable to me that we can consider sending funds to support a suspect, no-win, terrorist group while contemplating budget reductions that would endanger the health and welfare of so many of our citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of this unwise and unrealistic request.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, earlier I reserved the remainder of our original hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has 1½ minutes remaining.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of our time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN].

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, in the first part of January the information reached us that the Sandinista government had closed the Catholic radio station in Managua. This news was greeted by many, including myself, with a great deal of dismay. In fact, I joined in sending a letter to the Nicaraguan Ambassador to the United States protesting the closing of this radio station.

I bring this point up this evening in the closing hours of this debate to make it clear that many of us who oppose aid to the Contras in Nicaragua, the military solution to those problems, do not wish to whitewash the repression of the Sandinista government.

It is a curious political fact to me and others that while we talk about overthrowing this government, while we accuse the Sandinistas of being a haven for drug traffic, terrorism, the next Libya and the like, the United States maintains normal diplomatic relations with the Nicaraguan Government. It defies explanation to figure out why at a time when we are blaming them for the overthrow of their neighboring countries, while we are fearful of their outreach from Central America into the United States, that we would maintain normal diplomatic relations.

I will oppose Contra aid for this reason.

I believe the United States is a great power, but I think we found in Vietnam that we can be humbled if we do not use our power wisely.

The issue at hand is regional security. Unless and until we have the support of our allies, our efforts at regional security in Central America cannot and will not prosper.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. DURBIN] having assumed the chair, Mr. WHITLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 540) relating to Central America pursuant to the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 had come to no resolution thereon.

WE CANNOT TRUST THE COMMUNISTS IN CENTRAL AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DURBIN). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we are all familiar with the debate to simplify: We say if Nicaraguans are willing to fight and die to prevent Soviet guns from deciding the fate of Central America, we should help them.

They say, the other side, the Contras are not good enough to support, so we'll just stand by and let the Communists wipe them out.

Of course, the fact is, the Contras could be saints and the radicals in this House would not support them.

We never hear a peep about the Afghans or the Cambodians who are receiving our aid not being democratic enough, and Aquino can have all the Marcosistas she wants.

As for me, if they're good enough for Cardinal Obando Y Bravo, who is calling on the Sandinistas to negotiate with them, they're good enough for me.

At any rate, this debate is not really about the Contras or the Sandinistas: a large bipartisan majority now agrees that the Sandinistas must be stopped and it would be wrong to allow them to crush their fellow Nicaraguans with Soviet weapons while we stood by and watched.

What this debate is really about are two facts in this world that some Members of this House seem to wish would just go away: First, brutal Soviet-sponsored regimes; and second, people who are willing to fight them.

Until recently, we could go on blissfully ignoring the fact that nation after nation was falling to Communist cliques: 11 nations in 11 years.

Those nations are: Grenada, Suriname, Nicaragua, Angola, Mozambique, Ethiopia, Seychelles, Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, and Afghanistan.

These nations, except of course for Grenada, read like a who's who of the worlds most oppressive regimes.

In three of these nations, Afghanistan, Cambodia, and Ethiopia, millions—not thousands—millions have died of famine and outright holocaust.

Mozambique and Angola have their own Gulags, and Ethiopia is deliberately starving its people to death.

The carnage is continuing throughout these nations today and for a decade we have been able to practically ignore it.

But then something unexpected happened: People started fighting back. They started fighting for freedom.

Now people are fighting back in most of the Soviets' newly acquired colonies.

One might think that if there is one thing liberals and conservatives could agree on, it would be that we should help people get rid of communism.

But a strange thing happened: some members only seem to want to help the people who are farthest away and have the least chance of winning their freedom: The Afghans and Cambodians.

So now the world is looking to us: do we really mean what our Declaration of Independence says:

> That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men . . .; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive to these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it and to institute new government, . . . as to them shall seem most likely to affect their safety and happiness.

So we have to ask ourselves: how many nations have to fall, how many people have to starve, how many "Boat People" and "Feet People" have to leave their homelands, and how many people have to take up arms—before we will come to their side.

I think it is high time we supported the Nicaraguan people. If we do not, their blood will be on our hands and Nicaragua will go the way of the most oppressive regimes on Earth, and their leader, the Soviet Union.

Winston Churchill said in 1938, "Like the Communists, the Nazis cannot be trusted. Like the Nazis, the Communists are always looking for a new prize, a new foe, a new objective."

That has not changed. Their goal of worldwide revolution is just as aggressive today as it was after the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917, and it really concerns me that we have not profited from history.

In 1938, in August, Lord Chamberlain went to Munich and he met with Adolf Hitler. Adolf Hitler said to him, "If you will give me half of Czechoslovakia, I will sign an agreement with you, a nonaggression pact." Lord Chamberlain gave away the freedom of Czechoslovakia and went back to England and he said, "Peace in our time. Peace in our time."

We could not trust the Nazis then, World War II started because of that, and we cannot trust the Communists now. Those people are fighting for freedom down there today, and we need to support them.

NICARAGUAN DEBATE NOT VERY GOOD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, we had a long debate today on the issue of Nicaraguan aid. I would not call it a particularly good debate, however, because with the few exceptions we had a lot of Members of the majority party who came to the floor and refused to yield. They would make outrageous statements on the floor that in my opinion could not stand up to challenge, and then refused to yield when they were being challenged.

Therefore, what we have to conclude is that they simply were not willing to discuss the issue. They want to walk on the floor, make their 2-minute statement, and let it stand on the record without allowing someone to try to correct them along the way.

That does not yield a very good debate. It also tells me something about their side of the argument. Their side of the argument, it seems to me, is awfully weak if it cannot stand up to challenge. I can only conclude that there were many Members in this Chamber today who do not want to explain their support for a Marxist government that is one of the worst abusers of human rights in the world today, and that is indeed the way the Nicaraguan Government sees it.

I just came back from Nicaragua. The Nicaraguan Government sees this vote as a vote on it. We can have all the statements we want to on the floor about the fact that we hate the Sandinistas, too; we think they are a lousy government. The Sandinista Nicaraguan government sees this vote as a referendum on it. However this vote turns out, the Nicaraguan Government will see a vote against the Contra aid as being a vote for its position.

I listened to the arguments out here today, too, and I thought there were a lot of interesting arguments. It is interesting to go through them and figure out what the folks were saying out here that does not make any sense.

For example, they made the statement over and over again that the reason why we do not give Contra aid is because no one in the region supports Contra aid. Well, if that is the case, then we must not be giving any aid to Israel, either, because there are none of our allies in the Middle East who agree with us giving aid to Israel, and yet the aid flows. Most of the people who made that statement on the floor today vote for that aid to Israel. That is a nonsense argument.

They say, for instance, that we ought not interfere with a legitimate government in another country.

□ 1935

Well, what do they think we just did in the Philippines, and most of them supported that? We were directly involved in that. We helped get rid of the Marcos government and install a new government. That was not interference? Of course it was. That is a nonsense argument based upon our performance as a nation over just the last few weeks.

They say we should not support freedom fighters, that that is not a legitimate thing for this country to be doing. Then what are they saying, that we ought not support the Afghans who are fighting for their lives against Soviet tanks and Soviet gunships and Soviet Mig's. Is that what they are really saying? I do not think any of them would stand on this floor and say they do not think the freedom fighters in Afghanistan deserve support. Again, a ridiculous argument.

They said we will send them troops. What will happen is if things go bad for the Contras, we are going to send in our troops. I remember them well, and so they were the people who along the way when we had to go into Grenada as a result of threats to American lives, there was at least one Member of the left wing of the Democratic Party who stood up and suggested that we ought to impeach the President for that. Well I would suggest that we should never get to that kind of situation, that the best policy is not to have to send American troops, to allow people within the countries the resources that they need to fight for freedom themselves. That will keep American boys out. So the idea that we are going to send in troops if it goes bad is just nonsense.

They said that the $100 million would be better spent here at home. You know, that is a very emotional argument and it makes some sense to a lot of people. But where were they the other day when we had $250 million on the floor for Ireland? I watched that whole debate. I did not hear one of those people come to the floor and suggest that we ought not send $250 million of new money, not reprogrammed money, not money that is already in the Defense Department budget, new money, $250 million, we ought not send that to Ireland. Why? Because the Speaker of the House here was very much in support of that, and yet none of these arguments were made at that time. It is a nonsense argument. It is a way to appeal emotionally without really getting down to the real issue involved.

They say the Contras are all ex-Somoza Somocistas. They ought to go out in the hallway here and talk to 3 of the Contra leaders who are here on Capitol Hill. We have three of them who are not only not ex-Somocistas, these were the opposition to Somoza, and they are the people who are now Contras who are the opposition, and really these folks ought to talk to them. It is a nonsense argument.

They also say that the Contras have not won any military victories so, therefore, they do not deserve our support. If that is the criteria on which we are going to judge, then there is no Sandinista government in Nicaragua because the Sandinistas did not win any military victory either before they took over. The Sandinistas, with our support, with the support of our Embassy took over and yet they did not win any military victories.

These are not arguments, these are excuses, excuses for allowing a Communist enclave in Central America to further entrench itself.

WORK-RELATED DEATHS AND INJURIES COST TOO MUCH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of the House an article in yesterday's Wall Street Journal that dealt with the increase in job-related deaths, injuries, and illnesses.

As the chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and Safety of the Committee on Education and Labor, we deal with the issues of health and safety in the workplace on a daily basis. I believe it is imperative that every Member of this body, as well as our colleagues in the Senate, be aware of the increasing number of accidents, deaths, and serious injuries.

The present administration has stopped aggressive pursuit of employers who fail to provide for the health and safety of their employees, relying instead on voluntary compliance programs.

I don't doubt that they—both OSHA and the employers—mean well, but, let's face it, if no one is watching, too many employers will cut a corner here and a corner there. And, if OSHA is understaffed or if the inspectors are baffled by confusing and contradictory purposes coming from the head office, it is likely that a lot of seemingly minor violations will go unnoticed or unreported.

And then we'll have a situation like the one in New York City where, in two thermometer manufacturing firms, workers are threatened by exposure to unnecessary and, perhaps, excessive doses of mercury.

The figures cited in the Wall Street Journal article speak for themselves and they speak loudly about the impact of health and safety on people as well as business operations.

In 1984, the most current year for which we have figures, workplace fatalities rose by 21 percent from 1983, to 3,740, and injuries jumped by 13 percent to 5.3 million. In dollar terms, the National Safety Council estimates workplace accidents cost $33 billion in lost wages, medical expenses, property damage, and indirect costs.

And these figures don't even take into account the thousands who suffer and/or die every year because of a history of exposures to hazardous and toxic substances.

Simply put, the present administration, by its failure to enforce OSHA's rules, regulations, and standards aggressively has put every working man and woman in jeopardy.

And the result is a rise in work-related deaths and injuries some 2 to 5 years after policies are changed. And, in the article, former OSHA Director Eula Bingham predicts that things will get worse before they get better.

Mr. Speaker, I pray Professor Bingham is incorrect, but I fear she is not. For too long, as chairman of the subcommittee, I have had witness after witness come before us, testifying to the lax approach taken by OSHA in workplace inspections.

As I mentioned, the figures we have are for 1984, and, while the figures for 1985 will not be available for several months, the expectation by the experts is that deaths and injuries will rise.

As I said earlier, the numbers we have do not reflect the thousands of workers, both retired and disabled, who are going to die of disease caused by exposures to chemicals and other hazardous and toxic substances.

Those deaths will not be recorded as work-related so there will not be the hue and cry that we should expect when a large segment of Americans dies unnecessarily. I think it is criminal that in this country, in this day and age, men and women are exposed to so many substances in the workplace about which we know so little.

I am trying to do something about this, Mr. Speaker. In March of 1985, I introduced H.R. 1309, the High Risk Occupational Disease Notification and Prevention Act. This measure, which has been the subject of five intensive hearings by the Subcommittees on Health and Safety and Labor Standards, provides for identifying worker population at risk of disease because of exposures to substances for which OSHA has already developed permanent standards, would notify each individual of his or her risk, and would place that worker in an appropriate monitoring program.

There are a couple of key points behind the thrust of the bill. First, we know that some of the diseases these workers are at risk of getting can be arrested or alleviated if medical intervention occurs in the early stages of the disease.

Second, it encourages employers, who could wind up paying for the monitoring and eventual treatment, to seek alternative substances, when available, to replace the more hazardous and toxic ones, even if the alternative substance might cost somewhat more.

There has been opposition to the bill, Mr. Speaker, but it has been more in terms of the approach we offer than toward the concept. In fact, no witness, whether representing business, labor, the health field, government, or the insurance industry, has opposed the concept of what we are trying to do through this measure.

Further, all of our witnesses recognize that early intervention and preventive health care saves substantial dollars in the long run.

In an appearance before the Subcommittee on Health and Safety, Dr. J. Donald Millar, Director of the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, estimated that as many as 100,000 American workers die from occupationally related diseases and illnesses each year. And, since many of those diseases do not become evident for as many as 25 years after the exposure, the diseases are detected by physicians with no background in occupational medicine and who fail to see the relation between the patient's work and that disease.

The loss to America, both in terms of people and dollars, is something on which we must act. When I have difficulty getting colleagues to serve on my Subcommittee on Health and Safety, I fear that we, too, aren't as aggressive as we should be in overseeing the actions by those Federal agencies that regulate worker health and safety.

I am including the article from the Wall Street Journal because it is important that you, my colleagues, be aware of the situation and be prepared to do your part as we attempt to have the agencies under our jurisdiction do more than just the minimum.

JOB DEATHS AND INJURIES SEEM TO BE INCREASING AFTER YEARS OF DECLINE

(By Robert L. Simison)

Safety and health conditions in the nation's workplaces have stopped improving and appear to be deteriorating.

After declining for four straight years, the rates of work-related injuries, illnesses and deaths began rising across a broad front in 1984, the latest year for which statistics are available. Occupational safety and health professionals expect the 1985 rates to show a continued increase. They say that workplace safety simply has become less urgent to employers than it once was.

On a drilling rig near Gillette, Wyo., the top priority last September 17 was saving time and money. Despite state safety regulations against the practice. Exeter Drilling Co. began a test for oil and natural gas long before daylight. To do that is dangerous because the lights needed to operate in the dark increase the risk that a stray electrical spark will ignite the hydrocarbons. Just such an explosion occurred about 7:30 a.m., killing John E. Nelson, a 30-year-old rig hand, and injuring four other people.

Wyoming safety authorities cited Exeter for the violation, and Exeter is appealing. To have waited for daylight, an Exeter official says, would have raised costs by as much as $6,000 because of the time the rig and its crew would have been idle. Just a month after Exeter's fatal accident, a huge piece of drilling pipe came loose and crushed another Exeter worker to death. "In hurrying to do a job fast, somebody must have done something in the wrong sequence," says Douglas Basey, Exeter's administrative manager. "You've got to cut corners out there."

LESS STRESS ON SAFETY

Corner-cutting accounts for some of the rise in accidents. During the recession of the early 1980s companies reduced sharply their spending on health and safety. Then, with the recovery, many employers hired a significant number of inexperienced workers, which further contributed to the increase in mishaps. The Reagan administration has de-emphasized the writing and enforcement of safety rules. And employers have put greater stress on competitiveness, often at the expense of safety, specialists say.

The number of workplace fatalities in 1984 rose 21% from 1983, to 3,740, and injuries, 13% to 5.3 million. Workplace accidents in 1984 cost the economy $33 billion in lost wages, medical expenses, property damage and indirect costs, the National Safety Council estimates. The total excludes the effects of exposures to toxic substances, which can cause occupational illnesses that don't become evident for years.

"Occupational safety is suffering greatly by the neglect of the administration and the neglect and greed of employers," asserts Eric Frumin, the director of health and safety for the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union.

Government and business safety officials dispute that. "It ain't so that employers have been neglecting safety," says Howard Kusnetz, the president of the American Industrial Hygiene Association and manager of safety and industrial hygiene for Shell Oil Co. "An unsafe plant is an unprofitable plant." His association has begun writing exposure standards that employers can follow voluntarily for chemicals the government doesn't regulate.

WHAT TREND?

Moreover, some question whether workplace safety and health conditions have indeed begun to decline. "One 'up' year (in accidents) doesn't prove that," says Patrick Tyson, the acting chief of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration. Economic expansion accounted for much of the 1984 rise in workplace accidents, though not for all of it, he argues. Bureau of Labor Statistics data for 1985 won't be available until November.

But Mr. Tyson acknowledges that the 1984 workplace-hazard indicators rose too much in too many categories to represent a fluke. The Bureau's safety data, the best available, greatly understate accident and illness rates, it is generally conceded.

"Things will probably get worse before they get better," predicts Eula Bingham, a professor of environmental health at the University of Cincinnati, who was the OSHA chief in the Carter administration.

She argues that workplace accident trends seem to run in cycles, reflecting a three- to five-year lag between policy changes and their results. The 1984 increase in workplace accident and illness rates came three years after the Reagan administration started cutting health and safety enforcement and five years after employers slashed health and safety spending. Spending bounced back only in 1984 and 1985 and is expected to level off this year.

MORE INSPECTIONS

Some workers, district attorneys, legislators and OSHA itself are taking steps intended to reverse the trend. Labor unions and worker-advocate groups have sued to force stronger safety enforcement. Acknowledging concern over the rising accident rate, OSHA in January said it would subject some previously exempt employers to workplace inspections.

In the wake of the celebrated murder conviction of company officials last year in a Chicago workplace death, district attorneys from Waterbury, Conn., to Los Angeles have been hauling employers into court on criminal charges. In Congress, Democratic Rep. John Conyers of Michigan has proposed enactment of criminal penalties for company officials who fail to publicly disclose threats to workers' health and safety.

Safety conditions appear to have deteriorated most in construction, manufacturing, and oil and gas extraction. Much of the decline seems to reflect the shrinkage of certain depressed industries and greater emphasis on competition in others.

In the steel industry, for example, accident rates haven't increased dramatically, but "I'm convinced things are less safe and less healthy," says Michael Wright, the health and safety director of the United Steelworkers. He says safety complaints are up, although there are fewer workers in the industry. U.S. Steel Corp., with fewer supervisors to make sure that workers follow safety rules, is asking workers to shoulder more responsibility for their own safety.

For oil and gas extraction, the injury rate shot up 22% in 1984, more than for any other industrial category. Some in the industry, however, believe that the rate declined in 1985. But declining oil prices and drilling activity have idled thousands of rigs, making remaining rig operators intensely cost-conscious.

"How do you cut costs? First, you let the safety engineers go," observes a Wyoming safety official. Rig operators also are getting by with fewer and less-experienced hands. Inexperience apparently contributed to the death in February 1985 of a Wyoming rig worker who, after three weeks on the job, was hit in the head by a four-foot wrench when a big flywheel he was working on turned.

A number of recent industrial accidents indicate a pattern of neglect of safety-related maintenance and training. Nuclear Regulatory Commission investigators found that inadequate safety training contributed to the Jan. 4 chemical leak at Kerr-McGee Corp.'s Gore, Okla., uranium-processing plant that killed one worker and injured 32 other people.

On July 23, 1984, a Unocal Corp. refinery in Lemont, Ill., erupted in an immense fireball, rocking the ground for 50 miles. The accident killed 17 and injured 17. In proposing fines totaling $31,000, OSHA cited the company for improper inspection and maintenance of pressure vessels and lack of training for fire-brigade members, among other things. Unocal, which is contesting the charges, argues that it didn't break any safety rules.

DEATHS AT ST. JOE RESOURCES

Last July, two employees at St. Joe Resources Co. in Monaca, Pa., died of carbon-monoxide poisoning after entering a zinc-condensation tank. OSHA charged that the company had discontinued safety training and safety maintenance; the agency proposed fines totaling $20,000. St. Joe Resources, which is appealing, declines to comment.

Maintaining productivity at the expense of safety may have contributed to the death of two pipefitters last Oct. 3 at McDonnell Douglas Corp.'s fighter-plane plant in St. Louis, according to Ernest Johnson, an International Association of Machinists official. The two died of chemical burns after a 6,000-gallon tank they were filling with hydrofluoric acid overflowed. "The safety rules weren't being enforced; sometimes it cuts in the profit," Mr. Johnson says.

The tank didn't have a quantity indicator, and because a safety valve had been blowing out frequently, a solid rubber plug had been inserted "to avoid shutdowns," Mr. Johnson says. The men weren't wearing chemical-proof suits or respirators, as safety rules require. OSHA cited the company for eight alleged safety violations and proposed fines totaling $44,300. McDonnell Douglas, which is appealing the citation, declines to comment but says it is reemphasizing safety practices.

For some labor unions, health and safety issues have taken a back seat to preserving jobs. In Mayfield, Ky., United Rubber Workers Local 665 complains that it can't get GenCorp. The former General Tire & Rubber Co., to disclose contents of some chemical compounds, a contention the company disputes. "It's hard to get people to walk out over safety," says Danny Bruce, the president of the local. Some members only recently have returned from long layoffs. And, he adds, "calling OSHA is a waste of time."

The federal safety agency, established in 1970, has always faced a herculean task in attempting to regulate the nation's 4.6 million workplaces. But budget cutbacks and Reagan administration policy changes have shrunk what Congress's Office of Technology Assessment last year called "an already weak regulatory effort." At the end of 1985, OSHA had 1,089 inspectors, down 16% from 1979.

Perhaps most controversial has been OSHA's practice of conducting a full-scale inspection only if a facility's accident rate exceeds the national average. After examining the safety records of Film Recovery Systems Inc. near Chicago, an OSHA inspector left without inspecting the plant. Several months later, in 1983, a worker there died after inhaling cyanide fumes. Three Film Recovery officials were convicted of murder last year because of the unsafe conditions.

Some employers may manipulate their safety records so as to avoid OSHA inspections, safety specialists suggest. In Womelsdorf, Pa., Landis Kleinfelter, the safety chairman of United Steelworkers Local 3269, noticed that the North American Refractories Co. plant there was reporting fewer accidents to OSHA than it was to state authorities. He took the reports to OSHA, which in September cited the company and proposed a $5,000 fine for deliberately failing to report 137 injuries over four years.

"They doctored up the records so they wouldn't be inspected," Mr. Kleinfelter says. Company officials, who are contesting the charge, say they weren't required to report the injuries, many of which were minor. In January, OSHA changed its policy so that even some companies with apparently good records will be inspected.

GRAIN-DUST RULES

Critics, however, fault the Reagan administration for issuing few new work-place-safety rules or exposure standards. OSHA has been working since 1980 on grain-dust rules intended to prevent explosions in grain elevators. In 1983, the agency sent a proposed standard to the Office of Management and Budget, which took nearly a year to approve less stringent wording. A weakened rule is to be published later this year. Meanwhile, since 1983, the number of grain-elevator explosions has risen steadily, to 22 last year; there were four deaths in 1985.

Because a rash of trench cave-ins killed 42 workers last year, OSHA is stepping up efforts to inspect trenches. "Trenches are easy to dig, but people don't know how to do it safely," one OSHA official observes. OSHA has issued a civil citation against Kelran Constructors Inc. of Sedalia, Colo., in the cave-in deaths of four workers last July. In proposing civil fines totaling $50,000, OSHA cited the company for, among other things, failing to shore the walls of the 34-foot-deep trench.

Kelran, which is contesting the civil citation, maintains that, within cost limits, it tried to dig a trench that wouldn't cave in. The company asserts that there aren't any generally accepted safety standards for digging trenches and that OSHA's own rules are inadequate, a point that OSHA concedes. OSHA's proposed new rules have been delayed seven months by the budget office.

And, more and more, local prosecutors are stepping in. Criminal cases brought by the federal government, never very numerous, have plummeted under the Reagan administration. In Los Angeles County, a unit of the district attorney's office set up last year to prosecute cases growing out of workplace accidents claims two convictions in workplace deaths and has brought charges against employers in three other fatal accidents. A district attorney in Austin, Texas has charged officials of three companies with criminally negligent homicide in two trenching-death incidents, and a prosecutor in Durham, N.C., has charged officials of one company with involuntary manslaughter in another trenching fatality.

But the jury is still out on whether the wave of prosecutions will help. "It's a good idea, but it only gets the clear, outrageous violations," observes Nicholas Ashford, a Massachusetts Institute of Technology professor and a former chairman of the National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety and Health. "What characterizes most workplace hazards is their insidious nature."

THE REALITIES OF NICARAGUA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I have been on Capitol Hill for 10 years, 8 years in service and 2 years minus some campaigning time as a lobbyist for the strategic defense initiative of our President. I have waited 10 years for this moment because in the next 30 minutes I am going to show you pictures, garnered at some risk by the U.S. Air Force and our intelligence services that only a few days ago were classified top secret, no foreign intelligence allowed to view them. This is material that is available only to your Representatives and your Senators because, as many times as I have said it in this well, most American citizens are not aware that that treasured top secret or secret rating goes to a select few of our military people, and a select few of our civilian people, that type of secret briefing that the President gets, or even if they are nominated at one of our conventions Presidential candidates get, every one of the 435 Members of this House and every Member of the U.S. Senate is entitled to the minute he is sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States in this well or in the other body's well against all foes of our country, foreign and domestic. The pictures I am going to show you are of prisons, nine major prisons down in Nicaragua where there are at least 11,000 people. Somoza at his high-water mark only held 500 prisoners, except for a point after the Eden Pastora takeover of the country in August 1978, when Somoza shot up to about 800 and then started releasing them within weeks along with the release of some of the prisoners that Mr. Pastora had put his life on the line to get released, the very people who had betrayed the Sandinistas in that revolution to communism and has driven Mr. Eden Pastora back into the hills.

Before I do that, let me explain something that you do not understand around here. We have some of the best graphics sitting out in the hall that I have ever seen in what is called the Speaker's Lobby where only certain people with press credentials are allowed to move through that lobby, and where our Members are allowed to look at the wire services and read newspapers from all around the world.

One of the Members on this side of the aisle, I do not know why, trivialized the pictures of the prisons where people are in solitary confinement and are being tortured at this moment, and trivialized the pictures that you only heard about. I am now going to show you on the House floor, because I think maybe my side made a mistake in not bringing these out onto the floor to share with the people who attend our sessions here in the very few chairs that we have available in the galleries, and those Americans who are just now because of that laser beam of focus that our President has put on this issue, are just now beginning to rediscover from their seventh grade geography classes just where Nicaragua is, and the fact that it is closer to my district in southern California than my district is to this great capital. So talk to New Mexicans, Arizonans, Texans and all of the Gulf States and you will see why this issue loses its idealogical importance with those States that are closest to Mexico and to Central America. It is no small observation around here that three liberal Democrats of conscience are with the President on this issue because they have got some very vigorous Cuban-Americans, Cuban-Americans who had to flee Castro's little palm-covered Communist island that has been a colony to the Soviet Union for almost a quarter of a century, and that now sees its young men secretly baptized as Christians being sent over to the Saudi Arabian Peninsula in Yemen and killing and being killed in countries all over Africa, particularly Angola where our Government says there are 35, but Jonas Savimbi says there are 45,000 Cuban mercenaries.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman from California for yielding, because I think to emphasize the point the gentleman is making many people say, well, Nicaragua will not become another Cuba. I think we have evidence now that they may be headed that way already.

We have an article from this morning's paper from the columnists Evans and Novak that indicate that one of the commandantes who is the air force commander-in-chief for Nicaragua is right now on a secret mission in Moscow seeking a favorable sign from the Soviets; namely, a loan of Mig fighters, or the symbolic landing of a squadron of Bear bombers. Now this is the kind of thing that the Nicaraguans want.

The article goes on to say that they do not think they will get it from the Soviets. But it is apparent what it is the Nicaraguans want. The Nicaraguans want that kind of military presence by the Soviet Union in their country.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Of course they do.

Mr. WALKER. So it is very, very disturbing.

Mr. DORNAN of California. And it is to secure their political jobs, and it enables them to live in the former bankers' houses, and it enables them, like Tomas Borge, to collect their eight Mercedes Benz, small in comparison to the Marcos' loot, but still not the pure Communist egalitarians that we think about.

□ 1945

This first chart shows the active-duty armed forces in 1945 in a perfect graph size of a soldier. It shows that the size of the military in Nicaragua at 75,000 dwarfs all the other nations put together; and keep in mind that Costa Rica's services of 8,000 is a civil, rural guard; no military, and it has been that way from the Second World War.

Then they say, "Why haven't the Contras won" or they can't win? The Contras started out in 1980 with less than 400 people. They moved up to 4,000 the next year; 7,500, 14,000. They now have 20,000 potential people, if they have the arms and ammunition to fight for freedom.

Look at the growth in the meantime, relatively, of the Nicaraguan forces, supplied with the only tanks in Central America. You have heard all day 155 tanks. This is a relative thing.

If the Soviet Union and the Cubans had not been arming Nicaragua's Communist army to the teeth, the Contra freedom fighters shown in blue would at this point, in 1983, already been way larger than the Sandinista force that overthrew Somoza.

Keep in mind that the Sandinistas have unlimited arms and weapons from even democratic governments in Europe; because Somoza was a kleptogarch; a kleptomaniac and an oligarch, and then finally, our country even turned around an Israeli ship loaded with small arms ammunition for Somoza.

Because of the stand that the OAS took and our President—and I supported him in the end because Somoza was obviously an authoritarian and a thief—again, small potatoes compared to Marcos—but this is a relative position of the growth of the Communist forces.

What I have said—my colleagues in this Chamber on both sides of the aisle; very few on my side—where they do not attribute a sense of urgency to what is happening.

Here is the airfield that two of our colleagues, DAVE MCCURDY of Oklahoma and BOB STUMP of Arizona in our party, walked along this airfield right here on the ramp area—there are not that many hangars built—this is Punta Huete. No commercial airplanes are allowed to fly over it, but we have our ways, as they say in the intelligence agencies.

Jimmy Carter's first Executive order may have been to stop U-2 and SR-71 Blackbird flights, but President Reagan, with hindsight, was able to see what that naivete of 4 years of the Carter administration—not in our own interests, watching a Communist buildup—what it got us now.

This field has out here fighter hardstands. I flew in peacetime years as a fighter pilot—I know what a hardstand is; I know when they are building up to recieve the Mig's that Mr. WALKER talked about.

Punta Huete. If the Mig's come, that is where they go; right on the north shore of Lake Managua.

Here are the improvements at what is not a natural harbor, but pretty good water here, on El Bluff over on the other side. You have to fly here or take a ferry boat; but now they have already built the breakwaters—it may be too fine for you to see here, but it is accentuated by this black line.

Here are the ships, the Atlantic Freeze, the Niccaro, an extension of the cay—they are improving the airfield right through the center of the town. This is Atlantic water, Gulf of Mexico, Caribbean water out here. Here they are dredging—look at the size of this long series of barges and dredges, dredging a new harbor.

All the predictions that were made about the Soviets turning the American-built harbor at Cam Ranh Bay and our great base there with two parallel 13,000-foot runways into Soviet bases—it has all come true in Vietnam; the harbor at Danang, the old French-built harbor; and what we built at Cam Ranh Bay are now the two largest Soviet harbor facilities outside of main continental Soviet Union, approaching the size of Vladivostok in the north. Their whole Pacific blue water fleet harbors down there.

Time is catching up with me here, Mr. Speaker, so I want to get quickly to the prison pictures, because those are the ones that many of us begged to have declassified for this very debate today and tomorrow.

By the way, this is the Soviet flying tank, the Hind-D helicopter. It is the principal piece of genocidal machinery that is gutting the nation of Afghanistan. There are 10 million refugees in the world; 4½ million of those refugees are men, women, small children, and babies from Afghanistan, driven into neighboring Pakistan, really taxing Pakistan's economy to the very limit, and they have been driven out of that country most by this flying tank, the dreaded Hind-D.

There are 12 of them; 6 of them were seen recently at Punta Huete, that airfield that will take Mig's. I tell you as a former pilot who is also qualified in helicopters, I would take one Hind-D helicopter to 10 Soviet Mig's, even new Mig-25's.

Pulling off a target at 3,000 feet, lobbing in 500-pound bombs is nothing compared to the capability of this helicopter that can hold between 8 to 14 men, depending on how heavily you arm them. This comes in, strafes with gattling guns, rockets—in Afghanistan it is using poison gas—then it turns around and lands, and the soldiers come out and bayonet the wounded. We do not have any equivalent to that.

Here is the smoking gun that all my liberal colleagues of conscience ask for: This is what we call, with frustration, the "Smoking Lotta." This is a Soviet-made Lotta. It was so loaded to the gunnels with gelignite and blasting caps and ammunition, going from Costa Rica with free passage through Nicaragua up to Costa Rica that when it had an accident, blew a front tire, the lady who was unconscious that was driving this car with her agent cohort, Nicaraguan cohort, the lady started speaking in Russian, in her unconscious. When she came to, soldiers were probing around this car before they could even tell them to go search it, and here is what they found:

Is this enough of a "smoking gun" for you? Look at all these explosives. You know what this is used for? To kill U.S. Marines like Tim Webber, who graduated first in his class from the Fleet Marine Service and our Embassy Service, and asked to go to El Salvador because he said, "That's where the action is, and I want that as the honor graduate of this class." He and two other marines were not in El Salvador 30 days before they gave their lives for you and for freedom; and the fourth marine had only been there for a period of about 3 months.

Now, here is the map of these clandestine prisons. Pock-marking this once-gentle land, tortured under Somoza, now tortured under betrayed revolution, it is beginning to look like what Alexandr Solzhenitsyn called an archipelago—taken after a South Pacific island.

An archipelago of prison gulag camps. You can truly call them gulags because that is the special name given to Soviet camps for political prisoners. Who ever dreamed we would have a gulag archipelago right here on the continent of North America in that narrow isthmus we call Central America? That is only a real estate name.

That is one continent north of the Panama Canal, and it is our continent—we are all Norte Americanos.

Here is one of the prisons; it did not exist under Somoza: La Palerma.

Here is another prison: Asuncion. It is near Juigalpa, where this helicopter earlier was killing people.

Here is the Zona Franca prison system. Very close to where American Congressmen and Senators will land to get the grand revolutionary tour.

Here is Wasmoli Prison. Brand new—look at the size of this prison complex. This is all brand new construction. They are only building two things in Nicaragua, and I have just witnessed it for the fourth time with my own eyes, spread over 30 years. They are building military bases and prisons.

The military bases, they are slapping them up so fast, have kind of temporary look or quality to them, but these are the only permanent structures that communism brings to this little Central American country.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I just want to know, if the gentleman can tell me, how many bases have they built since they took power? I know Mr. Somoza, when he was in power down there, had what, 8 or 10 bases. How many do they have now under the Communist regime?

Mr. DORNAN of California. They have enlarged all of Somoza's bases and probably by a factor of 5 or 6 times that——

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. So they have 40 or 50 bases now?

Mr. DORNAN of California. Some 40 to 50, some people say 60, depending on what size installation you are talking about.

The Zona Franca Prison. we asked to visit. I had a meeting with the acting President because the head commandante, Ortega, was at Mr. Olof Palme's funeral in Sweden.

Now this Asuncion Prison—I'm sorry, that is just a repeat of that picture. I do not have all nine pictures. Some of them were so sensitive that they said, "Would it be OK if we declassified five?"

Now here is the one that President Carter asked to visit when he was in Nicaragua about 5 or 6 weeks ago, Tipitapa. Nice, innocent-sounding name. The Tipitapa Prison was Somoza's only federal penitentiary. There were city jails all over, where occasionally he would throw people, but as I said at his high water steady mark except for that one blip, after the Eden Pastora takeover of the Congress, up to about 800 or 900, the most he ever had was 500, and here is where he kept them.

Now, I do not know how good our cameras are; I am going to hold this as steady as I can. This black line is the limit of the old Somoza prison at Tipitapa.

It held 500 people. I talked to a man the other day that said, "Somoza threw me in that prison for speaking out for freedom and my room was right here" about a fifth of the way in on this last long building. He said, "When the Sandinista Communists arrested me, a loyal Sandinista, and threw me in prison for the second time in my life, there were 4,000 people in the prison that Somoza had kept 500 people in." He said, "when I looked out this window toward the northeast this was all a field. Now it is new prison facility, new prison facility, new prison facility, new prison facility." Are you listening, Msgr. Wilbur Davis, who has been sitting in my office all day long? You who likes to be called "Father Will," who has been taken for revolutionary tours down there as a guest of the Communist government, who called your own cardinal down there a liar, you who knows more than the 10 bishops, than the 840 priests, you who runs around with the popular movement down there of Communist priests who sold out to liberation theology and worse, you know more about this? You deny these prisons are down there? Come on, Father Will, before your name becomes Father "Devious."

Look at this, these are guard gun towers, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and maybe I counted that one and maybe not, 18. Somoza did not have these gun towers with Soviet machineguns to prevent anybody from escaping from here. But meanwhile while we were in the lobby of the Intercontinental Hotel, here is a great old American actor, nominated for academy awards, Gary Merrill, with all of his little friends from "Witness for Peace." They run up to the congressional group and tell us that we do not know what we are doing, that they really know the countryside. Do you think they have seen these nine prisons? They denied the reality of these pictures.

I ask everybody who is here and every American within the sound of my voice who either sees or hears about this: If you think your Government under Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan, or any President of the last 210 years would create phony evidence like this and debauch our CIA and our intelligence-gathering services and make liars out of the young intelligence pilots who fly the U-2's and the SR-71's whose motto is "Alone, Unarmed, and Unafraid," but off the patch they will tell you it is "Alone, Unarmed, and Very Afraid" sometimes, particularly in the perimeter of the Soviet Union trying to garner intelligence to keep the peace in this world, the kind of intelligence we did not have before the Second World War. If you think your Government would trump up this kind of evidence, then I will tell you something I feel sorry for you because I did not suspect that of my Government, my country and its Government and I do not care who the President was. Every President that I have ever lived under for the last 52 years has been an honorable man who would never do anything. They may misread it sometimes and they may hope that it is not coming in that hot. Kennedy was saying, President John F. Kennedy was saying that Keating, Senator Keating of New York, was jumping to conclusions until Kennedy saw the U-2 photographs of Cuba and saw nuclear warheaded intermediate-range ballistic missiles that could cover the whole southern part of this country, and he called in his brother and his Secretary of Nondefense or Undefense, Robert Strange McNamara, and he said we've got to do something right now. And he did something. He brought this country to the brink of a conflict by turning away Soviet ships at sea. As irony would have it, the first destroyer to turn around the first Soviet freighter was named the Joseph P. Kennedy after his older brother, who had given his life on an intelligence mission, blowing up, atomizing in thin air over the English Channel trying to go after German subpens. Every President is honorable when it comes to this kind of intelligence. You are now seeing photographs that were top secret just a few days ago and we get to see a lot more of this because you give up top-secret clearances when you elect us to office.

I yield to my colleague who spent a good, productive day in Nicaragua and another one in San Salvador with a heroic President.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman. I take the time to tell the gentleman that in another one of these things that sometimes confuses me and I must say many times angers me, I just had a call that indicates that while the gentleman is describing some of these things in the photographs up here that much of what the gentleman has shown and described is not making the TV cameras, that they are spending their time sweeping the chairs here and so on so that America cannot see much of what the gentleman is showing on his pictures. That is a disappointment. I think the gentleman is revealing some things, some intelligence photographs that this country does have a right to understand in light of the debate. It seems to me that what the gentleman is doing as a service to the debate would somehow be better.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Could I interrupt the gentleman a moment and ask the Chair how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. DORNAN of California. During those 9 minutes I am going to hold these pictures under my face. They have to come to me occasionally.

This is one of the nine clandestine prisons in Nicaragua, Carcel Modelo did not exist under the authoritarian oligarch, Anastasio Somoza. It exists now with the naive ignorance of many people on the religious left denying that this is a real photograph, saying it is a trumped-up phony picture of a Communist prison supplied by our CIA to the President. I am just telling you it is real. It is real. And if it is not real, I will resign from the Congress of the United States. How is that for those who would rather pan the cameras somewhere else?

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Did I understand the gentleman to say when I first walked in that in the small prison, the first prison down there, there were 500 people when the gentleman you referred to was incarcerated sometime back and the Sandinistas have put in eight times that many people in there, political prisoners, they now have 4,000 where they used to have 500 people?

Mr. DORNAN of California. This is the prison at Tipicapa, this black square, this perfect square out in the countryside not all that far from Managua. Somoza at his high-water mark, let me give you the figures, where they come from: Amnesty International and Americas Watch. I had my staff call and I called myself because I could not believe this. They said, and I quarrel with them less than you would think, but they said that their problem is they go after the right-wing dictatorships around the world, the totalitarian, authoritarian governments, because they cannot get into the Soviet Union. They have admitted to me that failing. They are getting much, much better. They told me except for a brief high-water mark of 800 prisoners after the Pastora takeover, that 500, and even then it was uncomfortable. It was a big jail, not like our prisons in some States where some of our States probably have the same poor system as this, trying to find the money to build prisons in this permissive age of ours when our prison population goes up. But this small prison was then stuffed, and that is the right word, stuffed with human beings. Let me tell you what we were told down there by Cardinal Obando y Bravo.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. These were political prisoners?

Mr. DORNAN of California. These are mostly political prisoners. Here is something that we were discussing while flying back home on a direct flight from San Salvador to this city in about 3 hours and 15 minutes. I said, "You know I can remember little nuns in school making me memorize the Bill of Rights, the first amendments to our Constitution, instigated by Thomas Jefferson."

We have one of our prime historians on the floor, NEWT GINGRICH of Georgia. Please check my historical facts, Professor, if you will, The first amendment that Thomas Jefferson would have phoned it in, I guess he sent a little message by ship. Our Consitution is great, it tells us how we are going to do everything, how everything is going to work but get it in writing, Jefferson said, what the Government cannot do to its citizens. The first one was, the first amendment of the Bill of Rights, "Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of speech." These 11,000 people are in there for speaking out for freedom and all of them hated Somoza and most of them spoke out against their revolution only when they felt betrayed, as the Kerensky revolution was betrayed in Leningrad and as Castro betrayed his revolution.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. It is my understanding that many of those people were put into prison with three-man tribunals, none of whom were lawyers. They could put people into prison for up to 30 years without the due process of law.

Mr. DORNAN of California. May I ask the gentleman to do me a favor? Would he give me that little red-and-black book from the top there?

Now continuing with our first amendment, "shall make no law abridging freedom of speech or of the press" and the word "the" is in there. Do you know what the word "press" is in Spanish? It is La Prensa. That is the name of the heroic paper that pulled down Somoza. It cost the life of the publisher-editor. People are convinced 90-95 percent that Somoza had him killed. There is a slight doubt that maybe the Sandinistas were clever enough then to kill him, one of the heroes of the anti-Somoza forces so as to really undo Somoza. The net effect was that Somoza started on a greased path to oblivion after Pedro Chamorro was executed in one of the major intersections downtown where there is a big memorial built to him. We met in La Prensa, the press, with all the editors, one of them with a pistolwhip wound across his forehead, several had been kidnaped. Even the lovely, beautiful young daughter of Pedro Chamorro, her name Christiana Chamorro, told us she had been kidnaped and threatened for a few hours just this year. She said, when asked by one of the Members, I think TOM DELAY of Texas, "Are you frightened?" she said, "Of course, I'm frightened."

Then they all went "Well, we all are." But they continue to publish. They get censored and they put the censored articles outside of the newspaper front knowing that it may cost them their lives or their freedom in one of these gulag prisons one day. She said, "My father used to tell us something always. We think of it often. He said we are all masters of our own fear." Meaning that fear is an internal thing that you can control if your cause is great enough. Then when we went on, Mr. WALKER and I and the other seven Members, to meet with Cardinal Obando y Bravo and two of his priests who had been beaten and threatened with death by Lenin Cerna—one of the subcomandantes. You like that first name, Lenin? I wonder if his mother gave him that name. I doubt it. Lenin Cerna told Father Bismarck Carballo, "I will kill you if it's the last thing I do." He said that on New Year's day when they shut down the Radio Catolica, while we were at the office of the curia with these three priests, a cardinal, a young bishop, Vivas, and Father Carballo, I thought of those words of the assassinated martyr, Pedro Chamorro, "We are all masters of our own fear."

When Mr. WALKER says to one of the human-rights men, and I am sorry, I have forgotten his name, because his name deserves to be emblazoned over this hemisphere as a hero, Mr. WALKER said, "Are you afraid, sir?" All of the people from the independent human rights group said, "Of course, we are afraid." They said, "We have been ordered that if we publish our latest report on human rights violations by the Sandinistas, we will all be punished."

And BOB WALKER said, "What are you going to do?" They said, "We will publish." The nine Congressmen broke out in spontaneous applause.

The same thing we felt with the private sector. Now I met with one of these gentlemen and he gave me permission to use his name all across the Americas, Enrique Bolyanos. I met with him with Congressman VIN WEBER in March of last year. He was then president of the private-sector group. Do you know what this has cost him? It reminds me about Thomas Jefferson's words about "We mutually pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." It has cost him his fortune, but it surely has not cost him his honor. It may yet cost him his life.

Soviet-weaponed soldiers showed up on his property June 24, 4 months after Congressman WEBER and I met him, and at the point of Soviet submachine guns, automatic weapons, as a matter of fact Kalashnikov assault rifles, they took away his 2,000 acres of cotton that he and his brother had built up from scratch in 1946. He said, "I started from scratch after the war; I will start from scratch again."

All his children are here in the United States now. He does not want to make the mistake of the Cuban middle class or business community where they all fled to Miami thinking that they would come back at the Bay of Pigs. Cuba has been a palm-covered prison ever since.

I will close on this. This man told me and I have given a challenge to my colleagues, "Prove this man to be a phony or a double agent, Alvaro Baldizon." I have written a "Dear Comandante" letter myself signed by about 20 of my colleagues to Ortega not to kill his brother in one of these secret gulag prisons or not to abuse his young wife and 7-year-old son who are locked up in house arrest down there. Baldizon has told me under oath and he said he will take truth serum and sodium pentathol that in 1981 Tomas Borge, and he was one of the favorite key lieutenants, aide-de-camps, Borge sent to East Germany three platoons of Sandinista soldiers to be trained for almost 6 months or over 6 months as disinformation specialists and counterintelligence forces. He said they were called "prophylaxia" meaning preventive, same thing it means in our language in Latin. Prophylaxia, troops that prevent the spread of the Contras by dressing perfectly as Contras, GI boots that they bought in the open market in South Korea, weapons, Israeli Galeels (?), falls (?) left over from Somoza, and M-16's that they captured—that they had, did not have to capture them, from Vietnam. They sent them out into the field. They have been out there 4½ years killing their own people. They know who the informer is in a little village like Wasmoli. So when they go in with a list and kill their own informer here is a person loyal to the Sandinista Communist revolution trying to help them and they slit his throat to make a political point. When Adolfo Calero called a rally of the FDN tribes early in 1983 they joined as a Contra unit and nobody could recognize them for what they were. They woke up in the middle of the night, slit the throats of all the real Contras, and everybody in that unit was promoted instantly to 2d lieutenant. I asked Baldizon in four 1-hour meetings I had with him, "Alvaro, what was the main thing that made you defect?" And I hope Monsignor "Devious" is listening. He said, "50 things made me defect." I said, "Well, what made you jeopardize your brother, your wife, and your son when you were investigating Sandinista corruption along the Honduran border, what made you walk across the border?"

He said, "Probably the No. 1 reason was capital punishment, because this country flaunts it in Europe and around the world that they have no capital punishment. I know of 700 secret executions of people."

He said, "Here is what happens. When you are arrested in the dead of night, if a neighbor sticks his head out, dares to, and sees you being arrested, you will not die. They will keep you in prison for 3 months. They will torture the blazes out of you, and they will intimidate you. But if no one sees you kidnaped, you die. Capital punishment in a Communist country."

That is what we are up against. I wish now I had taken an hour special order. Maybe I could get a few more of these secret prisons before the American public.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this much time.

I hope all of America watches our 1 hour and their 1 hour tomorrow. I hope the President prevails. This is a malignant cancer in our hemisphere of pure unadulterated Communist terror, and the truth is getting out.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

NO ANSWERS ON THE LEFT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. The title of my special order this evening is "No Answers on the Left." The basic point I want to make in a variety of ways is that, frankly, the great problem with the vote tomorrow, if you vote no, is what is your solution.

This is an honorable debate between patriots about how we deal with Central America. It is possible for a patriot to argue honestly and honorably that there is no Soviet Communist threat in Central America. That is a factual argument that is legitimate and reasonable. Some of our friends on the left will get up and say, "No, we should not do anything because, after all, we are not threatened."

It is also honorable and honest for a patriot to get up and say, "Well, we have some problems. Those are not necessarily problems worth our responding to." That is an honorable and a sound position.

The groups, I guess, that trouble me the most are in two categories. They are those who claim we have a problem, but it is not a problem worth worrying about. They do not like the Sandinistas, they have said all day today. They do not believe it is a good regime. They stipulate that it is a totalitarian regime. They recognize that it is bad to have Cuban colonial officers and have Soviet colonial advisers. They recognize there is a Soviet empire, "but." And there is always a "but" in the way they describe it.

Those in a sense are folks who, as Charles Krauthammer put it on Sunday, are engaged in what they regard as the Neutrality Act of 1986. Their viewpoint is the viewpoint that, while there is evil in the world, somehow we should not do anything about it.

I draw a distinction, and I think anyone who analyzes the modern left should draw a distinction, between those who sincerely are not afraid of communism and are willing to say so, and that it is not a matter of great importance to them—and that is a legitimate position for patriots to take—those who recognize communism is not—but do not regard it as a threat—and that is a legitimate position for patriots to take—and those who stand up and piously explain that they don't like communism, "but," that they are afraid of communism, "but," that they think we should do something about the Communists in Nicaragua, "but."

The point of my talk tonight is to focus on that group and one other group.

There is another group that is sort of in the middle, and they are trapped between, on the one hand being afraid of saying yes, and therefore making their radical friends in the caucus mad at them, or on the other hand saying no, and having Ronald Reagan and the American people, and possibly history, mad at them.

That group always runs around and says, "I would like to vote for you, if." And their "if" is always something that provides them with a reason not quite to be with you today. They really want to do something "if."

Now the real two audiences I am addressing, frankly, are the people who say, yes, communism is dangerous, "but," and the people who say I would like to be with you, "if." I want to walk through where I think we are at in America from their standpoint.

Let me, as I did earlier, address directly the question of patriotism. I think it was put by a gentleman yesterday who said that they wanted the Speaker to take down Mr. WALKER of Pennsylvania's words because, "He is questioning the judgment of other Members of the House." He went on to say, "He questions the judgment of the Members of the House who oppose the Reagan proposition." He said, finally, "Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do, because it followed a statement I just made where I indicated that I opposed the President's position, and certainly by inference he is questioning my judgment and I resent it."

Let me say, if I may, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], I think, frankly, he was questioning the judgment of the other gentleman. He was not questioning that gentleman's patriotism. He is a fine gentleman, a man who has served in this House now for some 15 years, a man who has a distinguished record.

What is at issue is not patriotism. What is at issue is judgment, reality, and the question of whether or not we have answers to the problems we are faced with.

Someone said recently that many leftwing Congressmen were traumatized psychologically as teenagers and college students in reaction to the Vietnam war. They now oppose any new information about the Soviet empire, because in their hearts, they know that if a Soviet empire exists, then their votes and their actions have increased misery, tyranny, and death for millions of people. They suffer from what psychologists call cognitive dissonance, which is a problem which says I cannot afford to learn this new information because it would cause me too much pain. I do not want to hear this because it would upset me, so I will reject the information, much as an alcoholic does not accept that he is an alcoholic because then he would have to give up alcohol which would be very painful, or much like a fat person who always looks for the calorie-less chocolate cake because while they would like to be on a diet, they like sweets even more. So they deny reality. Cognitive dissonance is a major problem in the U.S. House of Representatives today, because I believe that through cognitive dissonance, many of our leftwing friends remain committed to a pleasant fantasy world view because they find the frightening reality of the Soviet empire too horrible to think about, too threatening to their own past and to their present belief system.

It was said well, I think, in commentary March 1984, in an article by Penn Kemble, a man who is chairman of the executive committee of the Coalition for a Democratic Majority, and a board member of the Institute on Religion and Democracy. Penn Kemble said in an article entitled "The Democrats and the Kissinger Report":

> Today the problem is more a disorder of the mind, an inability to cope with complexities in public issues, a sophisticated form of simplemindedness.

That is, if I understand Mr. Kemble's point, what we are dealing with is not so much an intellectual problem as a psychological problem.

It is one he traces back, frankly, to the fact that we have not had, I think until the last 3 or 4 weeks, aggressive enough leadership in the White House in articulating what is at stake in Central America.

As he put it:

> The trumpet which was supposed to summon us again had trailed off into a medley of tiresome commercial jingles. Reawakened by Central America, the old anti-Vietnam coalition had begun to regroup and a new domestic political crisis threatened to develop. It was this threat first recognized by the late Senator Henry Jackson, a Democrat, and discussed before such audiences as the Sheetmetal Workers Union and the Coalition for a Democratic Majority that brought the Kissinger Commission into being.

It is important to recognize, first of all, that the pressures, particularly in the Democratic caucus, but to some extent among some Republicans, the pressures against American support for freedom fighters go directly back to the crisis of Vietnam and the fact that for 16 years now, we have been arguing about the nature of the Soviet empire and about whether or not Cuba provides a colonial army for the support of Soviet material objectives.

This was discussed during the Carter-Mondale administration.

I am going to quote from a brilliant essay by Edward N. Luttwak, professor at Georgetown University and a senior fellow at the Georgetown Center for Strategic International Studies. Mr. Luttwak is probably the leading expert in this country on the Israeli Army, a man who is remarkably wide ranging, with a Ph.D. in military history. His article, also in Commentary magazine, in the December 1979 issue, entitled "Cubans in Arabia? Or, the Meaning of Strategy," is one worth reading by every American asking themselves the question about why we are involved in Nicaragua.

He says:

> It is perhaps a natural consequence of our post-Vietnam predicament, in which we try to make foreign policy without a consensual world view, without a coherent scheme of our interests, and without even the vaguest sense of a national strategy, that our government policy-making and even our public debates on foreign affairs have themselves acquired a fragmentary character. We deal with issues seriatim, one by one as they arise, in reciprocal isolation, in a manner that we are pleased to call pragmatic but which is in fact merely episodic. Having no plan of concerted action ourselves, we imagine that others too are without plans; having no strategy ourselves, we imagine that others too conduct their policy in a fashion entirely unstrategical. Hence the episodic outlook.

The point Mr. Luttwak was making, the point which I think any reasonable reader of today's debate will conclude about the American left, whether it is a Republican left or a Democratic left, is that the Carter-Mondale administration, in its reaction to Vietnam, had no vision of the world, and because it was afraid to think and talk about the Soviet empire it could have no vision of the world because it is impossible to have a vision of the world that is realistic that does not take into account the Soviet empire.

I will bet, and I will go back tomorrow and check this, that in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for today, if you read it carefully you will find at least 20 Members of the left who say, "Why are we afraid of Nicaragua?" when, of course, the answer is we are not afraid of Nicaragua. Nicaragua is merely the current battlefield for Soviet imperialism; Nicaragua is merely the current arena for the Cuban colonial army.

What is at issue here is whether or not there is a Soviet colony being planted in the North American Continent. That is why this Congress is spending 10 hours on this debate. And it tells you something about the psychological and intellectual problems of the American left, that, faced with the reality of 2,500 Cuban soldiers in a colonial army in Nicaragua, faced with Soviet officers in Nicaragua, their question is to focus narrowly on the tiny country of Nicaragua and not on the vast threat of the Soviet empire.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I think the gentleman has touched upon a very important point, that being that the Soviets, along with their surrogates, have a global strategy, and we do not.

On the horn of Africa, Ethiopia, North and South Yemen, the Communists control those countries, and the Soviet Union and their surrogates, the Cubans, have taken control and have helped take control of that part of the world. What people do not realize is the egress of the Red Sea is there. Oil supplies that are vital to the free world come through that part of the world. The Soviets and their surrogates, the Cubans, have been working very diligently in the southern part of Africa. In Angola we have 35,000 to 45,000 Cuban troops and 12 Soviet generals, and they are bringing in planeload after planeload of military supplies to make sure that the Angolan Government prevails over Mr. Savimbi over there. In Mozambique and Zimbabwe you have two more Communist regimes. And they are moving toward southern Africa, with the African National Congress in the vanguard. If they are successful, five minerals that are absolutely vital to the security of the United States will be at risk. The only other place we can get most of those minerals is from, you guessed it, the Soviet Union. Forty percent of the free world's oil supplies come around the southern tip of Africa.

So the Soviet Union is playing chess on the horn of Africa, they are playing chess on the Persian Gulf, they are playing chess on the southern tip of Africa and they are playing chess, most of all, in our backyard in Nicaragua and Central America.

I flew into Grenada, along with some of my colleagues, the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN], who I think is gone right now, we flew into Grenada and we saw without doubt clear-cut evidence that the Soviet Union and her surrogate, the Cubans, plan to use Nicaragua and Grenada as a springboard for further military adventurism in Central and South America.

And today on this floor I think the gentleman from Georgia and others pointed out that of the 19 nations south of the Mexican-American border, 12 have either received weapons through Nicaragua or terrorists who were trained in Nicaragua or both.

So many of these fledgling democracies are at risk because the Soviet Union and her surrogates are moving in Central America right now.

I think the gentleman has made a very valid point by pointing out that the Soviets do have a global strategy and they are using chessmen, like the Nicaraguans, like the Ethiopians, like the Cubans, to achieve their goals, and if the United States does not wake up, we are going to be checkmated, we are going to be an island in a sea of Communist states. We must not allow that to happen. The Soviets are great chess players, but I think we are great chess players, as well. What we have to do is wake up Members on the left in this body to the fact that the Communists have one goal, and that is world domination, that they want to put us in an untenable situation on our southern border, our southern flank, the 2,000-mile border between us and Mexico. If they are successful in having a revolution without borders down there, as the gentleman from Georgia has pointed out many times, we are going to see a tidal wave of humanity fleeing Central America, South America, and Mexico and coming into the United States.

The economic problems we are going to suffer are going to be unbelievable, not to mention the military costs, because we are going to have to deploy troops on our southern flank. I call it the soft underbelly of America, the Mexican-American border, and it is going to be very costly both militarily and economically. If we can wake up our colleagues in the next 24 hours—and I know our valiant President is working very hard to do that—we can turn the tide to make sure the freedom fighters down there, who are fighting for their freedom and our freedom, will have a chance to prevail.

I thank the gentleman for making this very valid point in pointing out that they do have a global strategy and we should have one as well.

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank my friend from Indiana for commenting. It does seem to me that we have got to put this in larger perspective.

Tomorrow's vote is not a vote on the Nicaraguan reform movement. Tomorrow's vote is a vote on a Soviet Empire, on a Cuban colonial army, on a direct threat to the United States. I think that is the central issue. As I said, those of our friends on the left who, as patriots, do not believe that there is a Soviet Empire, do not believe that that is a threat, they have every right to say that.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield further, there was an article that Roland Evans and Robert Novak wrote I believe today or yesterday, and in it they quoted you about a Cuban general, a Gen. Nestor Lopez, who led a battalion of tanks, I guess, in the Yom Kippur War in 1974. He is now in Nicaragua. He is moving all over the globe in these wars of liberation, so-called.

Could you elaborate in your remarks a little on that?

Mr. GINGRICH. I was going to talk a little bit about General Lopez, because he is a perfect example of what we are talking about.

Mr. Luttwak, in his 1979 article, points out that people on the left kept laughing about a Soviet training brigade in Cuba, they kept saying, "Well, what does it matter that there is a Soviet training brigade in Cuba?"

Well, it matters a great deal because if you are the Soviet Empire and you can train Cubans in your tactics in Cuba and you can train them using your equipment, T-62 and T-72 tanks, and you can then pick up Cubans in an airplane, fly them to Syria, put them in exactly the same kind of tank, you are in a tremendous position to move people around the world and, much like a chess game, which is the favorite Soviet pastime, you are able now to say, "If we have a crisis, let's use the Cubans."

That sounds like scare talk. That sounds almost like Pat Buchanan. Can you imagine if someone had gotten up in 1972, and said, "If we allow Communist Cuba to keep being trained by the Soviet Empire, it is going to be a threat to Israel," people would have said on the left, "Why, that's silly. Of course it won't."

So let me read what Evans and Novak said today, because I think they put it pretty well:

> The arrival in Nicaragua last week of a Cuban general who fought against Israel in the 1973 Yom Kippur War is the launching pad for a new political effort to win the contra-aid vote in Congress on grounds that a vote against the contras is a vote against Israel.
> Brig. Gen. Nestor Lopez, the Soviet-trained Cuban commander who is just now making his debut in Nicaragua, commanded armored forces on the Syrian front against Israel and then stayed there for two more years. His move to Managua buttresses the administrations charge that a seamless web of left-wing forces now spans the globe, with the capability of pinpointing its power where and when needed.
> According to that theory, Lopez's battle experience in one theater of operations after another shows the capability of moving non-Soviet communist forces led by Soviet-trained officers into combat almost anywhere. The troops that fight on the Honduran border today may return to the Israeli border tomorrow. * * *

Lopez was one of the enemies of Israel who fought in Syria.

> * * * Indeed, at age 44 he typifies the Cuban communist professional who has made his mark in three theaters of war. A youthful fighter against the Batista regime in Cuba, he was trained at armor school in the Soviet Union. When the ill-fated freedom fighters landed at the Bay of Pigs in the spring of 1961, Lopez commanded one of the first Fidel Castro units to meet them.
> In 1973, he was sent to the Mideast in command of an armored regiment fighting with the Syrians against Israel along the Golan Heights, staying there throughout sporadic cleanup fighting that lasted into May 1974. All told, 3,000 Cubans were estimated to have been in Syria—including MiG and helicopter pilots.

According to The Economist's March 1978 Foreign Report, Cuban tank crews commanded by Lopex suffered 180 dead and 250 wounded in the Yom Kippur war.

Let me say as an aside that we do not know how many Israelis were killed by the Cubans.

I continue quoting from Evans and Novak:

> Less than a year later, in March 1975, the Cubans were dispatched to Angola to battle Jonas Savimbi's freedom fighters following Portugal's departure. Lopez was put in command of a Cuban armored division.
>
> Thus, while Washington sends one of its veteran peace-seeking envoys, Ambassador Philip Habib, to Central America, Havana sends one of its outstanding combat veterans to Managua.
>
> The Nicaraguan government's pleas for peace, echoed by Reagan critics in Washington, contrast with such war-like moves. Comandante Emmet Lang, the Nicaraguan air force commander in chief, is on a secret mission to Moscow seeking a favorable sign from the Soviets—such as the loan of MiG fighters, or perhaps the symbolic landing of a squadron of Bear bombers.

U.S. experts very much doubt the Sandinistas will get any such stakes-raising signal from the Soviets. But even without the Russions, internationalization of the communist struggle in Nicaragua is well along.

The globe-trotting Gen. Lopez shows what military analyst Edward N. Luttwak meant when he wrote that "the pieces are on the chessboard"—in the Middle East and elsewhere.

Tying Israel and the Contras together politically is not all that easy. Formidable Democratic spokesmen in foreign affairs * * * support Israel and oppose the Contras with nearly equal passion.

I am omitting some Members' nemes who are not on the floor.

(Many Members) will try to convince them they will not be able to perform that feat with impunity much longer. (One Member) acknowledged to us that the apparent contradiction made him "uncomfortable." But he said "the tail should not wag the dog"—that giving Israel what it asks is not the same as supplying arms to the anti-Sandinista Contras.

The point is simply this: The arrival in Managua of the Cuban general, with his battle ribbons from the Syrian front helps our effort to tie together the survival of Israel and the survival of freedom and to say to everyone that if you have a Cuban general trained in the Soviet Union who has fought now in Syria, Angola, and has now been sent to Nicaragua, what further proof could you possible want that there is really a Soviet Empire and there is really a struggle against freedom.

I will be glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. RUDD. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I commend the gentleman for his consistent and persistent search for the truth and an attempt to convey the truth to all of us here on the floor.

I have heard the gentleman make a number of good points and some statements were made today on the floor indicating that $100 million is not going to be enough and that, after all, 25,000 troops by the Contras will not be enough to overthrow the powerful, now well-armed Government of Nicaragua, and I would just like to make a statement on that effect.

I was a carrier-based fighter pilot in the Pacific in World War II, and there was not any question in my mind. The point was also made that we should not be overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua. But, after all, that is not really a duly constituted Government because they came to power behind the barrel of a gun and they have not done anything except to consolidate that power in the same way since. But we were involved in World War II in an attempt to overthrow that ancient dynasty of Japan. We intended to overthrow it. We fought in Europe to overthrow the hated fascist dynasty of Mussolini and Hitler's Nazi Germany.

But I wonder what would have happened in the Revolutionary War when our Founding Forefathers fought that war for liberty and freedom, an amateur military leader in the form of George Washington, who was entrusted with our rag-tag troops against the most powerful nation in the recent history of mankind at that time, the British Empire. I wonder what would have happened if General Lafayette, whose portrait appears here, would have said, "There is no sense going over and helping those people because they cannot make it." I wonder what would have happened if France would have said, "We are not going to help those people because they just have a rag-tag force there and there is no sense in us getting involved because they will lose the war." And that is what we are saying now, and the reason we are saying it is because we have been dragging our feet far too long and have allowed the Sandinistas in Nicaragua to consolidate their hold on the people, the atrocities that they have committed, the atrocities against freedom and liberty, everything we believe in, if those were good reasons, we would not be here today as a nation.

So I would like to respond to the gentleman's good statement in that way and I thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, let me say to the gentleman, I happen to have here, and I want to read a couple of them into the RECORD, letters from George Washington.

I was really struck the other night listening to one of our friends on the left that if they had visited Valley Forge in the middle of that winter, they would have voted against aid to the American army fighting for its independence, because it was clear that that army could never win.

I was tempted again and again today when people got up on the left and said, "Oh, the freedom fighters can't win," to say to them. "Have you ever visited Valley Forge?"

Let me give you just a few examples:

It will not be believed that such a force as Great Britain has employed for eight years in this country could be baffled in their plan of subjugating it by numbers infinitely less composed of men oftentimes half starved, always in rags, without pay, and experiencing at times every species of distress which human nature is capable of undergoing."

Again, let me suggest a letter from George Washington, who said, and I want everyone to listen to this in the context of all these comments about "the Contras can't win. The freedom fighter can't win. Why are we backing them?

To see men without clothes to cover their nakedness, without blankets to lay on, without shoes by which their marches might be traced by blood from their feet and almost as often without provisions as well, marching through frost and snow and at Christmas taking up their winter quarters within a day's march of the enemy, without a house or hut to cover them so they could be built and submitting to it without a murmur is a mark of patience and obedience which in my opinion can scarce be paralleled.

Now, he also goes on to advise about the importance of being strong. He said:

Had we kept a permanent army on foot, the enemy would have nothing to hope for and would in all probability have listened to terms long since.

Let me say, nothing galls me more than to hear people who voted against sending aid to the freedom fighters now complaining because the freedom fighters are not winning, when we have not been allowed to give them military aid. We have not been allowed to give them military training. We have allowed decent men fighting for freedom in their country to go up against Soviet Hind helicopters with nothing effective to counterattack, and in that setting to hear of people who voted against helping them complain because they are not winning is almost more than reasonable people can bear.

My point is simply, as I think my friend from Arizona was saying, that maybe instead of having another plane to carry people to Nicaragua, President Reagan should invite everyone who intends to vote no to fly to Valley Forge to look at that camp, not because the Contras are the moral equivalent of the founding fathers; whether they are or not frankly I think is a part of Americanism. There were a lot of things done in the name of revolution that had it appeared on the CBS news, people would have been appalled by. There were a lot of things done in any kind of civil war that are ruthless and vicious and bloody, but rather to say that for us to decide that we have the power to either give the Contras hope or to insure their defeat and we will decide they will lose, but then we will think we escape that blame for the defeat because we will say, "Well, they couldn't have won anyway," somehow I think denies the whole tradition of Americanism.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I live not very far from Valley Forge. I am wondering if in his reading of Washington's letters and in his reading of American history if my good friend, the gentleman from Georgia, has come across any record of serious human rights violations by American revolutionary soliders. I know that during those days obviously we did not have the kind of monitoring of human rights violations that we have today, but all of us know of armies in the past that have been responsible, even before 1776, for such violations, through a reading of history.

Mr. GINGRICH. Oh, there is no question, I think——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Just let me finish my question.

Mr. GINGRICH. I am sorry.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I am not aware, although I am sure there are always individual incidents, I am not aware that the American Revolutionary Army was engaged in the kinds of human rights violations that the Contras have been charged with.

I am wondering if the gentleman from Georgia can enlighten us on the subject.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think it is fair to assert that if one reads carefully the history of the American Revolution, particularly the Tory version of it, you will find that people were driven out of town, that on occasion they were killed and on occasion they were tarred and feathered, that there were a number of incidents that I think would clearly stand as violations of human rights, that people like Washington did not participate in them anymore than I think my friend from Pennsylvania would suggest that an Arturo Cruz would participate in them.

I think because of the tradition among English speaking people, there tended to be fewer acts of savagery, but frankly if you read carefully, for example, the war in western New York in which both sides tended to use Indians and in which there were atrocities of enormous savagery in which the patriots, for example, butchered women in the Indian camps, I think you would find that given the modern, I think correct, attitude that Indians being killed are after all still violations of human rights, that the patriots were fairly frequently willing to do pretty atrocious things.

It was a different era. It was a different standard, But I think the central point which my good friend from Pennsylvania is making is a very interesting one. In fact under the El Salvador Accord, I doubt if this Congress would approve aid to the American Revolutionary forces of 1777 or 1778, because I am fairly certain that they violated human rights frequently enough that we would look upon them with some horror, and I can guarantee my friend that if the British had as good a disinformation program as the Soviets and the Cubans do, that we would have more than enough stories and more than enough witnesses who would have been lying frequently, as Pravda does and as Castro does, that we would be totally confused.

I am glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Well, I can only say very briefly that it is the first time I have ever heard the human rights violations of the Contras justified by saying that Americans during the Revolutionary struggle did the same kinds of violations.

Mr. GINGRICH. I did not justify them.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. By saying that Americans during the Revolutionary struggle were equally guilty of the same kinds of violations.

Mr. GINGRICH. I did not say that.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. That is an altogether new reading of American history.

As I say, our friends on the far right in the extremist right wing elements of the Republican Party, of which there are sadly so few moderates left, I think have a very distorted and a very puzzling view of history. I say that to our friends on the right.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think that is fair. Let me say to my friend on the left, I think the gentleman misheard me. I do not think the American Revolutionary Army was ever in its official form under George Washington guilty of the kinds of atrocities which some American Revolutionary groups committed.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Or the Contras have.

Mr. GINGRICH. I do not believe, in all seriousness, for just a second—would my friend from Pennsylvania honestly suggest that the Indian wars in western New York were fought with a delicacy which would be appropriate to modern human rights standards? Would the gentleman seriously suggest that?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Certainly not, but that does not justify our condoning the violations which have been charged to the Contras.

Mr. GINGRICH. I did not condone them.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. And it certainly does not justify our paying for them.

Mr. GINGRICH. I did not condone them. Why does the gentleman put words in my mouth? I have never, ever condoned the Contras' human rights violations. What I said was that civil wars often produced them.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Well, I am glad that at least tonight that we have got the gentleman from Georgia on record as saying that. That is progress, I say to my friends on the right.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, let me just say, it is not progress. I have been systematic and rather frequent in saying that I think the best way to have an effective army fighting a war against the Soviet empire, an army that is well trained and an army that does not commit human rights violations is to have Americans training them with American values.

I would say to the gentleman that the more we have trained the El Salvadorans, the less human rights violations there have been.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Let me ask the gentleman a question about the training of soldiers with American values. Does the gentleman mean the kind of values enunciated in the bulletin or brochure of the CIA on how to murder Sandinista officials? Is that what the gentleman means?

Mr. GINGRICH. Absolutely not. I appreciate the gentleman bringing that up.

I was proud that when that was brought to the attention of the President of the United States, that people were punished for putting out that kind of garbage.

I would say to the gentleman that the American Army has overall, and the American Marine Corps, a rather exemplary record of trying to fight according to the rules of the civilized states.

I would say to the gentleman that I do not understand our friends on the left saying——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. We are not discussing the American Army. We are discussing the Contras.

Mr. GINGRICH. That is right.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. It is not the American Army that is fighting down there, not yet.

Mr. GINGRICH. And the question becomes, Are we more likely to get anti-Soviet freedom fighters well trained by having Americans train them, or by just backing out and pulling out?

Mr. GINGRICH. Of course they are.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. No one in the Democratic Party has suggested that we withdraw or back out.

Mr. GINGRICH. Of course you do.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. There is an alternative policy. In the last Congress we passed in the House, although not in the other body, an authorization, if the gentleman will recall, for $80 million to our allies in the region with which they were to interdict weapons. It never passed in the other body, so it never became law.

So it is not as if there is no alternative. No one, as the gentleman says on the left, is suggesting that we withdraw from Central America and that we do not have anything but a very crucial and vital role in that region of the world.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me just ask one more question of the gentleman. I am fascinated and I appreciate the gentleman taking this kind of time for this kind of dialog, which I think is healthy for the country. I think it is good for this country for us to have this kind of dialog.

As regards the freedom fighters and their effort to change the Communist dictatorship of Nicaragua, is it not fair to say that on the left there is no support for helping to provide funds to the freedom fighters?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Well, I do not speak for the left.

I think as the gentleman knows from reading yesterday's Washington Post that a majority of my party and a majority of the gentleman's party, according to the Gallup poll, both disagree very strongly with President Reagan on this particular policy and if the policy is proper, I wonder why a majority of the American people, even in the gentleman's party, disagree so strongly with him.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think frankly a large part——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I think the American people know what they are talking about when it comes to this issue.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think that in large part because the President has only recently begun to lay out clearly what is at stake.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. The more he talks, the more they disagree.

Mr. GINGRICH. Oh, I do not believe that is true. In fact, we have some polling data here that I will share with the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Well, I will give this to the gentleman.

Mr. GINGRICH. I have a copy. Why does the gentleman just not read the thing in.

Now, there is a poll which just came out. It turns out if you ask the American people, how would you like to go get involved in a fight in Nicaragua——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Well, I know the gentleman's views are not based on the polls. I was not suggesting that the gentleman from Georgia took the position he does because of public opinion polls.

Mr. GINGRICH. No, no; but I think the gentleman will find this polling information interesting.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I do not know that I will read all the polling data, but there is no question that if the American people are confronted with a question about the Communist menace and it is framed properly, the American people are very much opposed to turning our backs on an impending danger.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Well, I think the American people realize that the suggestion that there is today, I think the American people realize that.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If I may finish my question.

Mr. GINGRICH. Why not let the gentleman from Indiana finish and then I will yield back to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I will let my colleague from Georgia, who is more familiar with the poll, go into a little more detail; but let me just say this.

I have a firm belief that my colleagues on the left hide behind this human rights issue.

Now, this human rights issue has been distorted in large part by the Communist Sandinista government.

Today on the floor I came up to the mike and I talked about a Communist study, human rights study, that was paid for by the Communist Sandinista government that was put on the television airways in this country as fact.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. What study is that?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. It was a study paid for by the Communist Sandinista government at the request of the law firm of Reichler & Applebaum, who was paid $350,000.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. If the gentleman will just yield for a question, is the gentleman speaking of the study conducted by the Washington office on Latin American affairs?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. That is an outrageous and preposterous charge and I am here to deny it.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let the gentleman finish and then the gentleman can respond to it.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. It is virtually slanderous. If it were not on the floor of the House, you would be yanked into a court of law. It is a reckless and irresponsible charge and the American people who are subjected each night to this ought to be clearly informed of these reckless, irresponsible charges by the far right, the extremist element in the gentleman's party.

Mr. GINGRICH. Why does the gentleman not let me finish and then he can respond. Let me yield to the gentleman so he can make the charge and then the gentleman can respond.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. We hear the charges every night.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, the gentleman can respond after I make the charge.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I heard them make the charge today.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, then the gentleman can respond.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. The law firm of Reichler & Applebaum was paid $350,000 by the Communist Sandinista government last year to represent their interests in the United States.

According to the Wall Street Journal, a very reputable paper, they sent a team of human rights investigators down to Nicaragua to investigate alleged human rights violations on the part of the Contras or freedom fighters.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. When was this?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Well, let me finish.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. When was this? When was the visit? Just tell me, when was the visit to Nicaragua?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. It was just before the published document, but let me finish, and then the gentleman can respond to the charge.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I do not want to respond. I know that it is difficult for the gentleman to be objective, but——

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have been yielded to by the gentleman from Georgia. Will the Chair tell that gentleman over there to be quiet until I finish?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will maintain order and decorum.

The gentleman may proceed.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman from Indiana may go ahead.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. The law firm of Reichler & Applebaum sent this team of people down there. Their airfare was paid for by the Communist Sandinista government, as was their housing, their transportation and everything else, according to this article, and this article has not been refuted by anybody.

Now, after they came back, they gave a report to Reichler & Applebaum, but Reichler & Applebaum, according to this, wanted to distance themselves from this report, so they sent a second team down there to verify these statistics that were acquired during the first trip.

The second team was headed by a gentleman, an attorney, who has a wife from Nicaragua. She has two brothers, both of whom are members of the Communist Sandinista Foreign Ministry. He went down there and came back and verified the first report.

The report was then published by the Washington office on Latin American affairs, to which the gentleman alluded a moment ago, and Representative GUNDERSON, I believe, and others went before the TV cameras here on Capitol Hill and alleged that this was factual information and that this report was documented and was above reproach, and it was paid for lock stock and barrel by the Communist Sandinista government.

The reason I get very concerned and frustrated about this when the gentleman raised this issue during the debate is that not that human rights violations do not occur in any kind of military conflict, they do.

□ 2050

I am sure that the Contras have perpetrated human rights violations. But when I talked to the independent Human Rights Violations Commission in Nicaragua when I was down there last year, they told me the overwhelming number of human rights atrocities have been taking place at the hands of the Communist Sandinista government. And they said there is no doubt that there have been atrocities on both sides, but that this Congress, the left in Congress is really waving a red herring by saying that the human rights atrocities that are taking place are mainly at the hands of the freedom fighters. It just is not true.

What I believe that the left in this body is trying to hide by using this time and again, are the Hind helicopters flown to Cuba.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I am not going to participate in this session if the gentleman is going to talk all the time and talk all night. I am going to go home to my wife and my family. I am happy to respond, but if the gentleman is going to dominate the conversation all night, I am not going to stay here. I am going to go home. I think it is just that all of us get tired, and I think the American people get tired of listening to this every night, innuendo, innuendo, misstatements of fact.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Refute it.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Outright distortion.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Refute it.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. The fact of the matter is, I say to my friend from Indiana, I participated last month, along with a Member of the party of the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] in a news conference organized and conducted by the Washington Office on Latin America at which we released a report regarding human rights violations in Nicaragua. I must say that I do not know whether the gentleman from Indiana is speaking of the report which we released at that news conference last month. But we did release this report, and the report which we released was based on verifications obtained by members of congressional staffs, including a member of my own staff who traveled to Nicaragua last month, not at the expense of the Communist Party, but who traveled to Nicaragua and verified the human rights violations of the Sandinistas, and there are plenty of them. They are a bad bunch. And of the Contras, and there are plenty of them, and they are a bad bunch. They verified these violations that occurred and that were first made public in the initial or the original report.

Now I do not know if my friend from Indiana is making reference to these two reports or to some other report. That is why I tried, unsuccessfully, to find out the dates of the trips to Nicaragua because my staff member was in Nicaragua last month.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield, the report to which I alluded was a report that was published last year. Now you may have a subsequent report. I hope it is not as erroneous as the one published last year.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I do not know whether the trip made last month by congressional staff members verified the report the gentleman is talking about or whether it verified a different report, but the point is very much the same. The point is that American citizens are paying their hard-earned tax dollars to sustain a bunch of murderers, thugs, racists, and hoodlums who are not, as President Reagan said on television the other night, freedom fighters. They are the very people who fought against freedom in Nicaragua, who stood——

Mr. GINGRICH. Wait a minute.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I am going to be permitted to finish—who stood with Somoza in his final days. And if you look at the top military leadership, and the American people who are subjected to this drivel every night by the far rightwing ought to recognize that of the top leadership of the country, of the top 14, 12 are those who were associated with Somoza. That is a fact.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me just, if I may, ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania because I am a little confused here, I am not certain, and first of all, I must say, out of self-defense, I am not certain that a special order which quotes Penn, Luttwak, George Washington, and the New Republic, et cetera is necessarily drivel, but I can appreciate a difference of opinion. I can appreciate a difference in taste.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. It may not have been drivel at one time, but it has become drivel recently.

Mr. GINGRICH. Because I think this is an example of how we get very emotional without necessarily communicating with each other on both sides. I think the gentleman from Indiana made a series of allegations that were rather strong about a specific law firm and a specific report. I can appreciate if the gentleman from Pennsylvania thought he was referring to another activity that that might have got your dander up.

The question I would ask, I guess, is it seems to me this should be precisely the kind of debate which becomes factual rather than either ideological or psychological. That is, was the law firm in fact paid $350,000 by the Nicaraguan Communists and did the Nicaraguan Communists pay for the trip down there for that particular report. It seems to me we should be able by tomorrow to sort that out. That should not be a big problem.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I wish the gentleman would check that out.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. My concern, and I am sorry I do not know whether the report to which the gentleman from Indiana is referring is the same report that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] and I released at the news conference last month, but I know that the organization that the gentleman is speaking of, the Washington Office on Latin American Affairs, is the same organization.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. That is true.

The gentleman made one charge about the makeup of the Contras and he talked about them being Somocistas, rapists, horrible people perpetrating atrocities. And as has been brought out here on the floor a number of times today, it is not unusual for Communists to go in and perpetrate atrocities and blame it on their enemies, the freedom fighters.

But as far as the makeup——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. What does the gentleman mean by that? I wonder if the gentleman would explain that statement, because the President said that the other night. I think that we are entitled to an explanation.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GINGRICH. Go ahead and explain.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. It seems that the gentleman from Indiana cannot bear any questions.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I can bear questions. I can bear questions and will be glad to answer any questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would interject that the time is controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH], and he may yield the time to speakers. Perhaps we could be a little more orderly in the exchange.

Mr. GINGRICH. I appreciate the Chair's admonition. I have been a little lax because frankly I think it is a useful debate, and the college professor in me allows more sloppiness than the House rules do. Let me first yield to the gentleman from Indiana, and then I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a clarifying question.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I will be happy to answer his question as time permits.

Out of the 71 Contra commanders, 32 peasants, farmers, professionals, teachers, 19 or 21 ex-National Guard, none higher than captain except for the commanding general, what is his name?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Enrique Bermudez, a former Somocista.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. That is correct, 20 of the ex-Somocistas and paramilitary, 20 were in on the revolution that threw Somoza out, and I am sure you are not criticizing those.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. If the gentleman will yield for a clarification, the reason that the administration and its allies on the far right are able to distort these figures is because of the universe of personnel which they consider. What you have got to do is not look at the total leadership. You have got to look at the top military leadership, and if you look at the top, not the civilian leadership, but if you look at the top military leadership, you will find that the overwhelming majority, and I am prepared to say 12 out of 13, stood with Somoza as he fought against freedom in Nicaragua.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me reclaim my time. I want to ask the gentleman a question because you are raising, I think, a legitimate concern that any American who loves freedom and democracy should have.

Certainly to simply replace a left-wing dictatorship with a right-wing dictatorship, while it may help us in terms of the Soviet empire, is not the future that you and I want. However, in the New Republic in an article entitled "The Case for the Contras," March 24, 1986, they said, and I quote, and I would like you to comment on this: "The Contras are not Democrats but Somocistas." That is an assertion people make.

They went on to say, "It is true that some top commanders are ex-National Guards. But even the most conservative—and powerful—of the three political leaders, Adolfo Calero, was a longtime opponent of Somoza and jailed for his efforts. The other UNO leader, Arturo Cruz, an impeccable Democrat, says the Contras represent 'the revolt of Nicaraguans against oppression by other Nicaraguans.' One doesn't raise an army of 15,000 peasants with promises of restoring a universally despised dictatorship."

What is your reaction to that?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I think the distinction is very obvious. The gentleman from Georgia is speaking of the political leadership of the Contras. No one here during this debate, and this is the kind of thing—I do not think it is a distortion because I think my friend is sincere, but this is the kind of information which the American people ought to have.

□ 2100

Because I do not know that the average person watching tonight, or any night, recognizes the distinction between the political leadership of the Contras, the three gentlemen, two of whom you mentioned, and the military leadership.

We are talking about the military leadership.

Mr. GINGRICH. OK.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. And very oftentimes in these kinds of organizations, it is really the military people who have the power.

So when we speak of the association with Somoza, we are speaking not of the three civilian leaders, who I think are not the key players here; we are speaking of a military leadership which is dominated, I think almost thoroughly, by those who stood with Somoza.

I think that is the essential reason that the Contras lack the kind of popular support which, incidentally, I think the Sandinistas probably also lack within Nicaragua.

What we have to recognize is, we are not going to be able to change the government until you have the same kind of phenomena we experienced in Haiti and the Philippines. The way to go is not the way we are proceeding now; it simply cannot work.

It is a policy on which we have spent over $3 billion to date, if you include the military installations in Honduras. And what has it gotten us? More Soviets, I concede that. More Cubans, I concede that. More repression, I concede that.

It is a policy which has failed; it has not worked; it is a policy which ought to be changed; and the proper policy I think is one of negotiation, a policy about which I think the President has never ever made a sincere attempt—he is totally and thoroughly dedicated to the military overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me go back on your initial analysis, which I think is a reasonable analysis, but I want to pursue it with three questions, and we can have a dialog in just a minute.

First of all, you make the point that there are National Guardsmen from the Somoza era, high in the military leadership of the freedom fighters. If you were trying, in a country the size of Nicaragua, to organize an anti-Communist guerrilla movement, and the only army which had existed in your country for the last 30 years had been the National Guard, would not you be almost forced to accept at least some National Guardsmen in your leadership?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. If there were a real feeling in Nicaragua that the government should be overthrown. Yes, I would, but I do not see any indication that the Contras have that kind of popular support——

Mr. GINGRICH. That is fair—but I am trying to draw a distinction here—I am trying to ask you—there is a question of whether or not they have popular support. I am also saying, though, that as a matter of analysis, is it not fair to say that a group of political leaders who themselves are democrats, who are interested in democracy; if they turn to their own country to find people with military experience, they are likely, it seems to me, to find people who are in the national guard.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Do you not see that is where they failed? They have turned to Nicaragua to find those willing to sustain the Contras, and whom have they found? A bunch of Somocista thugs. That is the very point that I have made, that the popular opposition to the Sandinista government does not exist to the extent that I wish it did exist in Nicaragua.

That is why the Contras are having such difficulty in finding adequate, legitimate democratic leadership, because it does not exist.

Mr. GINGRICH. Wait a second. You miss my point. Assuming that the New Republic is anywhere close to right and that there are 15,000 people showing up who want to fight——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I do not think that is correct, by the way. It is way off. Your figure is double what it ought to be.

Mr. GINGRICH. All right, well, 8,000.

If you cite 13 of the top 15, and then he moves to a larger universe to get a better number, nonetheless the point is—out of 8,000, to take your number, the top 13 out of 8,000—again, if you are looking for trained military leaders with some experience, in a country the size of Nicaragua, are you not almost forced to get national guardsmen to be the trained leadership?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. If there were a popular movement in Nicaragua calling for the overthrow of the government, then that popular movement would consist of all kinds of people.

Mr. GINGRICH. And you are denying that——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. That popular movement does not exist, and so the Contras have been forced to look to the very people who were expelled from Nicaragua by the Sandinistas.

Mr. GINGRICH. But you are now denying, in effect, the gentleman from Indiana's assertion that below the top 13, there are a very significant number of nonguardsmen—this is a factual question, now—you are denying that there are a significant number of non-Somocistas in sort of the middle level leadership.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. What I am saying is very clear. I am not suggesting that the Sandinistas are loved in Nicaragua. Anybody as awful as the Sandinistas could not be loved.

What I am suggesting is, simply, there is not a popular basis for a military overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government.

Mr. GINGRICH. But that is a different question. I am not trying to get into that question. I am trying to focus you in on a common assertion about whether or not there are people from the national guard leading the army; and I am just asking you if you are going to have an army and you are going to start with somebody who has never been in the military, by definition, would not they be——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Does it not occur to the gentleman that one of the reasons that the army has been so unsuccessful militarily is because they are led by former Somocistas?

Mr. GINGRICH. OK. That is fair.

Now let me ask you two more questions before my time runs out; and I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] has time if we decide we want to pursue this.

Does it not—and I will not say to you that I think—I will say explicitly. I think it fair to question the degree to which there are Somocistas in the leadership. Then I would have to say to you, Is it not then equally fair to be frightened by the degree to which the Communist leadership of Nicaragua was systematically trained by the Palestinian Liberation Organization, by the Cubans—and I can cite here "The Sandinistas and Middle Eastern Radicals," by the U.S. State Department——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. There are more PLO in New York than there are in Nicaragua. There really are.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me cite you an example, and then tell me your version of this, because I am confused.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. How about the Basque Separatists? Does the gentleman include the Basque Separatists?

Mr. GINGRICH. No, no. Let me say something to the gentleman——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Because I know we all need to be deeply concerned in the United States of America about the role of the Basque Separatists in Nicaragua today. It is a serious question—also, the Red Guard.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say to the gentleman, and I mean this with respect, and yet I have to say: The last two sentences or three sentences, if you will go back and read them tomorrow, and put them in the context of Ed Luttwak's article, will probably explain to you everything about our frustration with the left in this debate.

The Palestine Liberation Organization is a large, sophisticated terrorist institution, committed to the destruction of Israel, systematically allied with Cuba and the Soviet Union. It is not a game; it is not funny, it is not the Basque Separatists or some looney group wandering around southern Chicago.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Your President mentioned the Basque Separatists.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think there are in fact Basque Separatists sitting down there because, as early as Claire Sterling's book on the Terror Network have indicated, that Cubans and the Soviets systematically train terrorists.

I can asure you, if there are south Chicago terrorists available, there is a PLO camp that will train them. Now, I do not think that is a joke. I do not think it is funny.

The question I would ask the gentleman is, Does it not bother you, for example, that Sandinista Patrick Jorgeo Ryan was killed hijacking an El Al airliner in 1970, as part of a PLO group; that the Sandinistas deliberately named a dam for him? That in fact there is a systematic relationship.

The gentleman talks about the Somocistas; how about the fact that most of the senior Sandinista leadership is systematically tied in to Castro, to communism and to the Palestine Liberation Organization? Does that worry you a little bit more than a defunct regime that is gone?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Sure, it worries me, and I am as appalled by the presence, the limited presence however, I think of all of these people.

What concerns me, though, and I am sorry that the gentleman cannot understand this—I guess he just disagrees—is that a lot of us feel that the President has exaggerated the presence of these kinds of people; that it is really a kind of scare tactic.

I am not defending the PLO or the Ayatollah Khomeini or even the Basque Separatists, but a lot of us have a hard time taking very seriously these kinds of tactics which we really regard as scare tactics.

My guess, and I do not know for a fact, my guess is that there probably is some involvement with the Sandinistas and drug traffic.

Yet, in this morning's Washington Post a spokesman for the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Agency, the DEA, denies the President's claims. If my friends from Georgia and Indiana saw the national news tonight, I think on CBS there was a point-by-point rebuttal to the points the President had made regarding drugs; and I am not suggesting there is not any involvement with drugs; I think there probably is.

I am not suggesting there is not any involvement with the PLO; I think there probably is. And I certainly do not come here, and I know the gentleman—because we have participated in a number of television programs together—knows that I am not a defender of the Sandinistas.

What we are saying here is that there has been some exaggeration, some rhetoric, which is really I think quite irresponsible.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say to the gentleman, I happen to agree with you that I think the President made a mistake in drawing a larger picture. I think the central issue in Nicaragua is the Soviet empire, the Cuban colonial army, the ties to the PLO, and whether or not collectively they are a threat to American, not Nicaraguan, security.

Let me ask one other question——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask another question—go ahead.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. GINGRICH. Sure.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I wonder if he would just be specific regarding his definition of the Soviet threat to the United States in Nicaragua, because I have heard often my colleagues on the right say that it is not Nicaragua we are concerned about, it is the presence of a Soviet base in Nicaragua that we are concerned about.

Mr. GINGRICH. If the gentleman——

Mr. KOSTMAYER. If I could add two amendments to that question, No. 1, I wonder if you could speak in military terms, because I think it is our military concern that we are really concerned with here; and second, if you could speak in fairly specific terms.

What is the specific Soviet military threat in Nicaragua today to the United States?

Mr. GINGRICH. I have been told I have 2 minutes, so we will finish this; but I appreciate very much the gentleman from Pennsylvania joining us; and I think frankly this makes for a better dialog than, as you put it earlier, just having drivel on the right. I think this is more educational for our constituents and our colleagues.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I wonder about that, but I am glad to be here.

Mr. GINGRICH. I see three major——

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Let me take 5 seconds.

I want to refute two things. First of all, there is popular support for removing the Sandinistas. President Monge of Costa Rica said recently, just before he left office, that if there were an election in Nicaragua, in his opinion, 80 percent of the people—a free election—80 percent of the people would vote against the Sandinistas.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. That is not what the American Embassy told me in Nicaragua. They told me the contrary.

Mr. GINGRICH. Go ahead.

□ 2110

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. That is No. 1. No. 2, 98.5 percent of the total Contra army are non-Somocistas.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Talking about the military leadership, not the infantry, obviously.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me talk in my last 40 seconds probably about the three threats. The first that I mentioned before the gentleman from Pennsylvania came over is the very real fact that in Cuba, Soviets have already established a colonial army. If Nicaragua gives them a second colonial army, it increases their assets whether it is in Syria, where the gentleman may not realize that the current Cuban general in Nicaragua served against the Israeli, or whether it is in Angola or Ethiopia or Mozambique or the next place they try to colonize. So that is the first asset. The second asset, I think it is an asset to the Soviet empire to have a country on the mainland of North America where it is easier to organize guerrilla movements. We have exclusive statements that they are already training guerrillas for Costa Rica, Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador, and, as you know, they already control and train the guerrillas that are fighting currently in El Salvador.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Chairman, a very brief question.

Mr. GINGRICH. I only have a very short few seconds.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. A very brief question.

Mr. GINGRICH. Very well.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GINGRICH. OK, let us try again tomorrow night.

INTRODUCTION OF THE EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR DISABLED AMERICANS ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which is a revised version of a bill I introduced earlier in the 99th Congress, H.R. 2030, "The Employment Opportunities for Disabled Americans Act." The changes that are included in this revised bill are the result of literally hundreds of letters and comments from individuals in the disability community.

The purpose of "The Employment Opportunities for Disabled Americans Act" is to remove a major disincentive to employment faced by persons with disabilities who are fearful that working may jeopardize the health care coverage already provided to them by the Supplemental Security Income Program [SSI]. The legislation will: Permanently authorize section 1619 and thus remove the primary risk associated with working under the SSI program; require the Social Security Administration to notify prospective participants about the program and, where feasible, designate a section 1619 specialist in district offices in order to enhance its utilization; and provide automatic reinstatement to those individuals whose irregular earning would render them temporarily ineligible. Taken together, these and other provisions in the bill, will serve to remove the barriers to employment which currently exist in the section 1619 program.

This legislation is a final step in the evolution of section 1619 that began in 1980. Current Members of Congress, including Senators BOB DOLE and PATRICK MOYNIHAN as well as Congressman PETE STARK, had the vision to realize that provided with the appropriate incentives and services, persons with disabilities could overcome their handicaps and become independent. The step that we are proposing today is a refinement of the work that was done in 1980 when section 1619 was created.

Currently, there are approximately 7,200 persons with disabilities participating in section 1619. The number of working-age disabled Americans receiving SSI is approximately 1.8 million. Fear that section 1619 will not be reauthorized prevents a significant number of those 1.8 million persons from taking advantage of the program. By permanently authorizing this program, we are removing a disincentive that presents itself as a risk to persons with disabilities.

I have become aware of that risk by numerous conversations I have had with disabled persons who have told me of the dilemma they encounter when faced with an employment opportunity. Let me take a moment to describe a composite of the kind of situation this legislation would impact.

The typical situation is this: A person disabled at birth, with a severe disability which may confine that person to a wheelchair and require the need for attendant care, has nonetheless combined the will to be independent with the appropriate training, and is offered a job with full-time earnings. If the person accepts the job, and Congress does not reauthorize section 1619, the individual is faced with the reality where the cost of his or her health care may consume the lion's share of earned income. Not accepting the job will maintain this person in the SSI Program, with an approximate annual income of $4,000, but with eligibility for Medicaid services.

In other words, without section 1619, this individual may not be able to afford to earn a living. Forced to choose between working and not knowing if Medicaid eligibility will be available to meet health care needs, and not working, but assured that Medicaid services will be available, disabled persons are too often forced to choose unemployment.

This legislation has two benefits: First, it will provide persons with disabilities on SSI with the security they need to accept that job and lead independent lives. Second, it will provide a cost savings to the Federal Government.

For every person who participates in section 1619(b) and who would have otherwise received a full SSI benefit of $336, the Federal Government saves a little over $4,000 a year. Thus, for every 10,000 persons who participate in 1619(b), we save $40 million per year. In addition to this cash benefit savings, we know that this same 1619(b) participant will pay income taxes. A recent State of Wisconsin survey of working-age SSI recipients with physical disabilities estimates that the taxes generated on average by this participant to be approximately $1,500 a year. And on top of this, we know, based upon information from the Social Security Administration that 32 percent of 1619(b) workers are being covered by their employer's health insurance plan, resulting in additional savings in Medcaid.

"The Employment Opportunities for Disabled Americans Act" will contribute significantly to the lives of many persons with disabilities, and perhaps the greatest testimony to this is the bipartisan support it has generated. Major congressional leaders from both sides of the aisle have indicated their support for this measure, and I am confident that this bipartisan spirit will continue. I would like to particularly thank and note the support of Chairman HAROLD FORD of the Subcommittee on Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation.

Other provisions in this legislation, aside from those mentioned above, will:

Allow section 1619 participants who are institutionalized to remain eligible for benefits for up to 2 months. This eligibility is provided to such individuals once within a 2-year period.

Require the Comptroller General to conduct a study of the operation of section 1619 to determine the nature of the program's utilization and the effectiveness of related programs conducted in connection with the provision of benefits under section 1619.

Allow individuals whose entitlement to child's insurance benefits under SSDI would make them ineligible for their SSI disability benefits, to continue to remain eligible for Medicaid, so long as they would have remained eligible for their SSI disability benefits in the absence of their SSDI benefits.

Extend the Social Security Administration's waiver authority regarding disability demonstration projects.

Amend the Social Security Act upon the date of enactment.

I would like to thank countless persons within the disability community who have contributed to the development of this legislation, and in particular recognize the efforts of Dr. Robert Griss with the State of Wisconsin Department of Health and Social Services. Dr. Griss has provided me with valuable information and advice stemming from his research in Wisconsin.

I would also like to point out that the following organizations have indicated their support for this legislation:

Save Our Security (representing over 100 national organizations concerned with Social Security programs).

American Association of University Affiliated Programs.

Association for Retarded Citizens of the United States.

Epilepsy Foundation of America.

Goodwill Industries of America.

International Association of Psychosocial Rehabilitation Services.

Mental Health Law Project.

National Alliance for the Mentally Ill.

National Association of Developmental Disabilities Councils.

National Association of Private Residential Facilities for the Mentally Retarded.

National Association of State Mental Health Program Directors.

National Association of Rehabilitation Facilities.

National Association of Protection and Advocacy Systems.

National Association of State Mental Retardation Program Directors.

National Easter Seal Society.

National Head Injury Foundation.

National Society for Children and Adults with Autism.

The Association for persons with Severe Handicaps.

United Cerebral Palsy Associations, Inc.

This legislation is by no means a panacea. It is important to note that unemployment among persons with disabilities will continue to be unacceptably high even with the changes to section 1619 proposed here. According to recent figures supplied by the Congressional Research Service, 59 percent of working-age disabled persons are not working. This bill is part of the solution to this problem, but only a part. I look forward to working with Members of Congress on this and the remaining parts of that solution.

PRESIDENT'S REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR NICARAGUAN OPPOSITION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-185)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committees on Appropriations, Armed Services, and Foreign Affairs, and the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Since I transmitted my message to the Congress on February 25 requesting additional assistance for the Nicaraguan democratic resistance, I have heard from many thoughtful Members of Congress, as well as from Latin American leaders and the leaders of the Nicaraguan democratic resistance. Many have raised the question of how the additional authority I have requested could be implemented so as to help persuade the Government of Nicaragua to engage in a serious effort to resolve the conflict in Central America through peaceful means.

I am determined to make every effort to protect our vital interests and achieve peace without further loss of life. That is why on February 10 I proposed simultaneous talks by the Government of Nicaragua—with their opposition and with the United States. That is why on February 25 I affirmed my commitment to direct the additional assistance I have requested toward a comprehensive and verifiable agreement among the countries of Central America, based on the Contadora Document of Objectives. And that is why on March 7 I appointed Ambassador Philip Habib as my special envoy for Central America.

On Sunday night, I described to the American people the threat to our security that confronts us in Central America. As I said then, we are still willing to pursue vigorously a diplomatic effort to achieve a lasting peace. Approval of my request for additional assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance does not mean that a military solution is inevitable. It is, however, essential that the Congress act now to approve this assistance if diplomacy is to have a chance. Accordingly, I am providing in this message a further explanation of how I will implement the authority I have requested.

If the Congress approves my request I will send my special envoy on an urgent mission to the capitals of the Contadora and Support Group nations. He will ask them to join with us in urging the Government of Nicaragua to initiate a national dialogue with representatives of all elements of the democratic opposition, designed to achieve the goals set out in the widely heralded proposal announced by six opposition Nicaraguan political parties on February 7, 1986. Their proposal, which has been endorsed by the Nicaraguan democratic resistance, calls for an immediate cease-fire, an effective general amnesty, abolition of the state of emergency, agreement on a new electoral process and general elections, effective fulfillment of international commitments for democratization, and observance of implementation by relevant international groups and bodies.

President Duarte's additional proposal for simultaneous dialogue with the Salvadoran guerrillas, a proposal endorsed by the democratic Presidents of Costa Rica, Honduras, and Guatemala, reinforces the importance of an internal dialogue in Nicaragua to address the objectives of the six-party proposal of February 7.

In order to give the Government of Nicaragua every reasonable opportunity to respond favorably, and to provide an incentive for a positive response, I will limit the assistance to be provided to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance for 90 days following approval of my request to the following:

(1) humanitarian assistance, as defined in section 722(g) of P.L. 99-83, including support for programs and activities to strengthen respect for human rights;

(2) logistics advice and assistance;

(3) equipment and supplies necessary for defense against air attack;

(4) support for democratic political and diplomatic activities; and

(5) training in radio communications, collection and utilization of intelligence, logistics, and small-unit skills and tactics.

Following this 90-day period, additional types of assistance will be provided to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance only if—

(1) I have determined, after consultation with the Congress,

(a) that the Central American countries have not concluded a comprehensive agreement based on the Contradora Document of Objectives;

(b) the Government of Nicaragua is not engaged in a serious dialogue with representatives of all elements of the democratic opposition, accompanied by a cease-fire and an effective end to the existing constraints on freedom of speech, assembly, and religion; and

(c) there is no reasonable prospect of achieving these developments through further diplomatic measures, multilateral or bilateral, without additional assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance;

(2) I have reported my determination to the Congress; and

(3) Fifteen days have elapsed following my report to the Congress, during which the Congress may take such legislative or other action as it deems appropriate.

Should the conditions described in subparagraph (a) or (b) of paragraph (1) later be achieved, assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance will again be limited to the categories, described above, available during the initial 90 days following approval of my request, for so long as the Government of Nicaragua acts in good faith to maintain those conditions.

In order to keep the Congress fully and currently informed of developments relating to diplomatic efforts to achieve a peaceful resolution of the conflict during the 90 days following approval of my request, I will appoint a special bipartisan commission to report on negotiations, whose reports will be made available to the Congress. This commission shall be composed of individuals, none of whom shall be a Member or employee of the Congress or an officer or employee of the United States, recommended by the Speaker and minority leader of the House of Representatives and the majority and minority leaders of the Senate, with a fifth member of the commission to be recommended by the four other commissioners.

This approach represents a sincere effort to achieve peace through negotiations. In order to further this effort, I will make $2,000,000 of the funds I have requested for assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance available to the Central American democracies (Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras) to facilitate their participation in regional meetings and negotiations. In addition, I will encourage those countries and the Contadora and support group nations to make regular and public reports on the status of negotiations, the likelihood of achieving a comprehensive agreement, progress toward national reconciliation, and the obstacles thereto. Moreover, the United States will assist all indigenous groups which are committed to work together for democratic national reconciliation in Nicaragua based on the six-party proposal. We will require only that they respect international standards of conduct, refraining from violations of human rights or other criminal acts, and that they work together toward this common goal.

In this regard, the democratic resistance has been broadening its representative base. The United Nicaraguan Opposition [UNO] now includes the largest of the Indian/Creole resistance groups [KISAN], and has forged cooperative relationships with other democratic resistance elements. The UNO has also engaged in constructive discussions with the Southern Opposition Bloc [BOS]. And UNO has further strengthened unity by ensuring that all its military forces are responsive to its civilian leadership. We wholeheartedly support these developments and will encourage the democratic opposition to take further steps that will increase its unity and its appeal to the Nicaraguan people. Toward this end, I will reserve not less than $10,000,000 of the funds I have requested for assistance to resistance forces otherwise eligible and not currently included within UNO, one-half of which shall be for BOS and one-half shall be for the Indian resistance force Misurasata.

However, no group shall receive assistance from the United States if it retains in its ranks any individual who engages in—

(1) gross violations of human rights (including summary executions, torture, kidnapping, forced recruitment, or other such violations of the integrity of the person); or

(2) drug smuggling, or significant misuse of public or private funds.

There are two other issues, relating to funding, that I ask you to consider.

First, there has been inaccurate public speculation about what additional funds for assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance might be available beyond the $100 million for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 that I have requested be transferred from amounts already appropriated to the Department of Defense. I want to state unequivocally that I will not augment this $100 million through the use of CIA or any other funds that have not been approved by the Congress for this purpose.

Second, when I proposed to the Congress a Central America Democracy, Peace, and Development Initiative to implement the recommendations of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, I included Nicaragua among the countries that could benefit from this initiative. The Congress accepted my recommendation in enacting a new chapter of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. The Congress also authorized in that Act, as the Bipartisan Commission recommended and I requested, the appropriation of the full $1,200,000,000 in nonmilitary assistance for Central America for fiscal years 1988 and 1989. However, the current authorization for fiscal year 1987 falls short of this goal. This, combined with appropriations shortfalls from previous years, is an obstacle to timely progress. I will ask the Secretary of State, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, and the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to develop a plan to overcome the funding shortfalls that have occurred. In addition, I urge the Congress to provide the full amounts of economic assistance I have requested in my budget for fiscal year 1987 so that the necessary long-term commitment urged by the Bipartisan Commission will be fulfilled, and so that the promises of peace and freedom will be realized throughout Central America.

Upon the enactment of a joint resolution approving my request, I shall issue an Executive order to provide for the implementation of the undertakings I have expressed in this message and in my message of February 25. The Secretary of State, or his designee, will be responsible, under my direction, for policy guidance and coordination of United States Government activities under that Executive order.

In conclusion, I must stress that our diplomacy cannot succeed without the demonstrated resolve of the United States to protect its own interests and those of the brave men and women who are fighting for democracy in Central America. The time for decision is now. Your vote on my request will be a fateful one. I need and urge your support on this vital issue.

RONALD REAGAN.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

FAMILY

HON. JIM KOLBE

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, an article appearing in the Tucson Citizen told the story of a couple in their early sixty's who have been foster parents to 233 babies since 1966. It's a story of 233 adopted children who spent the first few days and weeks of their lives loved and cared for by two special people. Many of us are here today because as children we were nurtured by the love and support of our families. They helped develop our self-esteem and gave us the courage to achieve our goals. This story celebrates the hundreds of foster parents across the country who work to make "family" a reality for our children.

[From the Tucson Citizen, Feb. 19, 1986]

FAMILY

Most families have brought a baby home from the hospital once, twice, maybe even a few times.

Delores and Leonard Hartman have brought a newborn into their home hundreds of times, as foster parents since 1966. After 20 years with babies in the house, they're retiring.

But if babies waiting for adoption could somehow choose someone to care for them, the Hartmans would get a lot of votes.

"I just love babies," Mrs. Hartman said. "When my youngest child started school, I knew some people at church who were doing foster care for the Arizona Children's Home Association, and that's how I got into it. But mostly I just love babies."

The couple's first baby had red hair and was named Tommy. "I'll never forget our first one—he was a little redheaded baby. My husband has red hair, and he'd always wanted a redheaded baby. Well, now we had him."

Over the years, 233 babies, all under age 2, have stayed with the Hartmans until moving into their adoptive parents' homes. The longest any has stayed has been eight months, when there were medical problems that held up adoption. Most have stayed only a few days or weeks.

No matter how short the stay, though, they've been important to Mrs. Hartman. "I took a picture when I got the baby and a picture when they went home. I recorded their weights and I gave every baby a name." She also recorded the names the babies' adoptive parents gave them, but some adoptive parents would ask the Hartmans what name they had chosen and would keep it.

Eight photo albums are filled with memorabilia from each baby's time with the Hartmans. "I enjoy looking at them. Also, sometimes I even hear from some of them," Mrs. Hartman said.

The Hartmans reared four children of their own and now have five grandchildren. Hartman is 62 and his wife is 61.

Even though she's retiring as a foster mother, Mrs. Hartman is not giving up the three babies she cares for during the day. All three are under 1 year old, and that is the way she likes it. "Let someone else potty train them," she said.

But what about colic and all the other well-known hazards presented by having a very small person in the house? Mrs. Hartman admitted that some of the babies have been hearty criers and some have kept her awake nights. She did acknowledge that being up all night and then having three babies walk in the front door the next morning was a little tiring. But not too tiring.

Loving children, especially babies, seems to run in the family.

The Hartmans feel able to retire because their daughter, Nancy Higginbotham, will take over. Higginbotham, a mother of two, had been a foster mother in Flagstaff and recently moved to Tucson. She also will take in infants through the Arizona Children's Home Association.

"I never thought I would retire," Mrs. Hartman said. "But things do have a way of working out. Nancy was already an infant foster parent in Flagstaff. When she moved to Tucson, I knew I could retire."

Mrs. Hartman had high praise for the Arizona Children's Home Association, saying it does an excellent job of matching infants with adoptive parents.

She also had a little advice for mothers trying to decide whether to give their babies up for adoption. "Some people have a bad idea about foster parents, but we love babies and we take good care of them. If a girl can't take care of her baby, it's the right thing to do."

But of herself she said, "This has just been my life. I started babysitting when I was 11. There seems to be a need I have that nothing fills except a tiny baby."

DAVID WHIPPED GOLIATH

HON. TOMMY ROBINSON

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, last Friday on a snowy evening in Minneapolis I was fortunate enough to witness a miracle. Before nearly 30,000 fans David whipped Goliath. My alma mater, the University of Arkansas at Little Rock, in their first ever appearance in the NCAA tournament and their first ever game against a top 10 team, mustered all of their poise and talent to beat Notre Dame. I know that it was a disappointment to the Fighting Irish and the loyal fans of that great institution and sports powerhouse on the eve of St. Patrick's weekend, but it was a great day for UALR, the city of Little Rock, Coach Mike Newell, his team and our alums. Coach Newell, Paul Springer, Myron Jackson, Pete Myers, Michael Clarke, Paris McCurty, Ken Worthy, Reggie Smith, Curtis Kidd, assistant coaches Tom Brown, Robert Kirby, Jeff Dittman, Jim Calvin, Kevin Angelin and all of your support staff—I am very proud of you. Following is the account of the game as reported in the New York Times, Sunday, March 16, 1986:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 16, 1986]

NEWELL PUTS THE IRISH AWAY AND HIS SCHOOL ON THE MAP

(By Gerald Eskenazi)

MINNEAPOLIS, March 15.—They didn't even bring along their cheerleaders, but the chancellor is here, along with a few dozen fans and a basketball team named the University of Arkansas-Little Rock Trojans.

In their sudden spurt to the national scene, and in their very first appearance in the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament, they unseated nationally ranked Notre Dame by 90-83 on Friday night.

That propelled "Ualr" (as their warm-up jackets read) to the second round of the Midwest Regional on Sunday against North Carolina State, whose coach, Jim Valvano, says: "You don't like to play a team that has a hyphen. They're all 'cause' games. Those teams have a mission."

Indeed, the Trojans' coach, Mike Newell, concedes that the only reason he left as an assistant at powerful Oklahoma was because the new chancellor at Arkansas-Little Rock told him he wanted to put the school on the map.

"We had guys not going to class," Newell said. "I kicked four guys off the team. A lot of people roasted me for that."

His first season, 1984-85, produced a 17-13 record following a 14-15 mark. This season, the team is 22-10, winner 18 of its last 19 games, and 9 in a row, following a 4-9 start.

And, says Newell: "The average grades of our players now is 2.3. When I got here, it was something like a 0.8."

As Newell was talking this morning in a hotel coffee shop, Chancellor James ("Call me Jim") Young walked over to talk.

"I was telling Mike at halftime in the conference championship: 'I've taken you this far. The rest is up to you,' " Young said.

Young, who also has finished his second year at the school, laughed, but said, "We brought him in for the program."

The conference is called the Trans American Athletic Conference, and its schools are little known except regionally.

"If U-LR is ever to get known—it's sad but true—it'll be through the athletic department," said Newell.

He seemed hardly surprised by the victory over 10th-ranked Notre Dame, which had just finished its finest regular season in 12 years with a 23-5 mark. In fact, to hear Newell tell it, he has a team verging on a national powerhouse. It just needed a victory such as this to put it into the limelight.

"I was more concerned that we'd play a Louisville or an N.C. State because of their size and the talent of their athletes," he said. "Notre Dame is predictable. You can put a game plan together, and they're not going to vary."

But he also needed some coaching tricks. His team is not very tall—the taller guard is 6 foot 3 inches, his forwards are 6-6, the center is 6-7. The Trojans needed to halt David Rivers, the dervish-like whirler who makes Notre Dame go. The Trojans also had to avoid foul trouble against one of the country's top free-throw-shooting teams.

"We're a real good defensive team in man-to-man coverage," Newell said, "but I felt in this game if we went to man coverage early we'd put Notre Dame in foul situations."

The zone included double-teaming Rivers, forcing him to shoot from outside, a weakness.

"I looked at his field-goal stats and saw he was about a 44-percent shooter," Newell said, "which tells me he's not an outstanding outside shot."

But although Newell had prepared his club for pressure games, he could not have imagined that the players would do in such a situation.

Michael Clarke, a 38-percent free-throw shooter, hit a remarkable 11 of 14 free throws—78 percent. The team, which had shot 64 percent from the free-throw line during the season, converted 24 of 32 against the Irish, or 75 percent. In the second half, the Trojans hit 79 percent from the floor and kept even with taller Notre Dame in rebounds for the game.

Newell's philosophy is positive thinking.

"I want them to think of playing against big-time schools," he said. "The only way you can improve your program is by improving it. So I upgraded the teams we play against. The problem is, with a school like ours, the big schools don't like to come here. How would it look if they got beaten in Little Rock? So we have to play them on the road."

According to Newell, "No one bothered to recruit the kids I have."

Those recruits include three junior-college transfers from a school in Alabama, and a 6-9 player named Daron Hoges he is red-shirting.

"He'll be in the pros one day," said Newell. "He's from Macon, Georgia. I visited his home, it was on a redclay road. There weren't even any street signs. When I pulled up I saw him leaving the house with a bucket to feed the chickens. Inside he had one of those old-fashioned stoves that you lift the lid to put wood or coal in."

Newell is 34 years old, tanned and blond. He is fond of a baby-blue sports jacket, which is an anomaly here, where the temperature is in the 20's and the threat of snow always present.

Yet, there is nothing gee-whiz about his attitude. He believes he has a quality team.

"He can tell you he doesn't feel like an underdog," said Valvano. "But he knows what this means for his program nationally. We've been on network TV, and 20 years from now we still will be. But when I coached at Iona and we played Louisville in the Garden, it took me five years to get them into the Garden. So Newell might not say he's an underdog, but he's got a cause."

LIABILITY INSURANCE IN PERSPECTIVE

HON. BILL ARCHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, all Members of Congress are hearing a rising tide of complaints about the cost and availability of liability insurance. It is a problem that will not go away and which will continue to grow unless it is put into perspective. The general public and elected officials have to realize how we have reached the point where businesses are closing or restricting their operations due to the cost of obtaining liability coverage.

A recent column by Andy Rooney does indeed put the liability insurance crisis into a perspective that should drive home to every American how we have arrived at the point where we find ourselves today. I commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

WE ALL PAY FOR THE FLIMSY ASSURANCE OF INSURANCE

(By Andy Rooney)

There's no such thing as living without taking some risks and if you take risks, the law of averages makes it certain that you'll lose every once in a while.

It's too bad we ever got the idea we could insure or assure ourselves against all bad things that might happen to us. The idea has created a legal monster for the court system and a financial monster of insurance payments for all of us. We refuse to accept the fact that some things happen to people for which there is no recourse. There is not money enough in the world to pay for all the sadness we suffer. There isn't gold enough in the ground to make everyone who has ever been permanently disabled feel better about it. And yet that's what judges and juries keep trying to do by handing out million-dollar liability judgments.

The insurance situation is out of hand. It's natural and popular to blame the insurance companies but it isn't usually their fault, it's our own. We have a disease that's become an epidemic called "litigiousness." The carriers of the disease are lawyers. There are a certain small group of lawyers who encourage people to sue any individual, company, institution or government that might conceivably be to blame for something that has happened to them.

Several months ago I bought a football helmet for a piece I was doing for television. I was shocked that the helmet cost $150.

Why was the helmet so expensive?

"About one third of that price," the manufacturer told me, "is for insurance premiums. There are lawyers who go to high school football games just to see kids get hurt. Then they go to the boy's parents and suggest that they have a case against the school or the makers of the equipment for negligence."

The lawyer doesn't charge the parents a fee, instead he takes as much as half of any winning judgment. His interest isn't justice, it's money.

Ladder companies are frequent targets for lawsuits. There is a small company that makes ladders on a road I travel frequently in the summer so I called and talked to the president. Who knows, I thought, maybe I can get rich. Three years ago I fell off a ladder when I did a really stupid thing that was totally my own fault. Maybe I can sue, I said to myself.

"Last year," the president told me, "we were sued by someone who fell off a ladder we made 35 years ago when my father was president of this company."

Ski resorts are charging $25 to $35 for a lift ticket for one day because their insurance costs them so much.

In Yellowstone National Park, people can no longer hike on a quarter of the good trails and they may remove all the bears from the park because someone who was attacked by a bear on one of those trails is suing for millions.

Doctors in the United States hardly dare practice some areas of medicine because of the cost of malpractice insurance and there are communities where a woman can't have a baby delivered because obstetricians have been forced out of business by the high price of malpractice insurance. Even lawyers and insurance companies have been put out of business by malpractice suits.

In hundreds of little towns, taxpayers are putting out more money this year for insurance premiums than they are for police and fire protection. There's something wrong there.

Jurors are handing out million-dollar judgments every day. Twelve people faced with the sad face of one life at least partially destroyed by an accident, usually vote in favor of the individual and against the impersonal company, city or institution. It's natural for compassionate people to do that.

The fact of the matter is, though, it is not the company, the city or the institution that is paying the million dollars. The victims are all of us.

BLACK BAGS ARE BACK

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, churches which have given sanctuary to Latin Americans fleeing political persecution in El Salvador and Guatemala have recently been subject to a campaign of lawlessness and violence. Files and mailing lists from church offices have been stolen and informers have been placed in congregations around the Nation. The following article by Gerald Renner, a religion writer for the Hartford Courant, looks into this illegal campaign against sanctuary churches and at the Government's possible role in this effort to stop the sanctuary movement.

BLACK BAGS ARE BACK

Had Jamie Mock-Robbins not had a compulsion to keep up with current events while on his honeymoon last July in Yellowstone National Park, he would not have found in USA Today's state-by-state roundup that his Seattle church had been burglarized. The associate minister of the University Baptist Church later found out that the burglars had not take anything valuable, but instead had rifled through church files and mailing lists and had even gone through the unopened mail on his desk, especially, he said, those letters that were "related to sanctuary."

University Baptist was one of the early public sanctuaries giving refuge to people fleeing political persecution in El Salvador and Guatemala. The third floor of the church has been converted into apartments where eight Central Americans now live. Donovan Cook, another minister of the church, has been named a co-conspirator in the current Tucson sanctuary trial in which 11 people are being prosecuted on federal charges of conspiring to smuggle aliens into the United States illegally. One of the church's refugees, Elba Martinez, has also been named an unindicted co-conspirator.

The case of the University Baptist Church is not unusual. Similar instances of burglaries in sanctuary churches are being reported from sea to shining sea.

The Old Cambridge Baptist Church in Cambridge, Massachusetts, has been hit by a 13-month-long revolving-door series of five burglaries (the most recent on December 4). "Four or five offices are always the target," church administrator Peggy Smith says—offices used by organizations concerned with Central American issues. In only one instance, she added, has anything of value been taken: two answering machines and a camera.

Further south, in Louisville, Kentucky, on November 21, someone broke into the rectory of St. William Roman Catholic Church where James Flynn and five others live in a "Catholic peace community." "They left files on Central America all over the place," Father Flynn reports. "One rather sensitive letter on sanctuary that had been buried in the files was left in the middle of my desk. . . . They obviously wanted to let people know they had been there." Similar burglaries of churches—as well as of offices of lawyers and organizations working on behalf of Central Americans seeking asylum—have been reported in Philadelphia, Phoenix, Detroit, Guadalupe, Arizona, and Berkeley, California.

What is going on here? Who is reopening the "black bags" thought to have been shut tight after the scandal of FBI lawlessness during the civil rights and anti-Vietnam war movements? And what motivates the slopping burglars: a desire for information or the aim of harassment, or both?

Suspects range from government intelligence agencies to private right-wing vigilantes to the sanctuary workers themselves. In Cambridge, police blamed the unsolved break-ins on "street people."

Spokespeople for the FBI and the Immigration and Naturalization Service heatedly deny that their agents are involved. "For a federal agency to do that is illegal without a court order," Bill Carter, public affairs specialist at FBI headquarters in Washington, points out. Anyway, he says, the FBI "would not be involved in surreptitious entry to begin with" because the evidence gathered would be "tainted" and unusable.

Carter went on to note that the burglars did "very unprofessional jobs" and that if the FBI did make surreptitious entries, no one would know it. Reminded that the FBI once engaged in harrassment with its notorious "Cointelpro," he dismisses that parallel: "We live in a different world than we once did."

At the Immigration and Naturalization Service in Washington, Spokesman Duke Austin becomes almost combative at the suggestion that INS agents were responsible for the burglaries. "Any government agent doing that is jeopardizing his whole career," he says. "Let me suggest another scenario: they [the sanctuary workers] are doing it themselves, all over the country."

The INS is understandably touchy now that it is public knowledge that the agency has hired informers to infiltrate churches in search of undocumented aliens.

Accusing the INS of indiscriminate spying on churches, Phoenix lawyer Sara Baird says, "This has never before happened in American history . . . . I researched that thoroughly going back to the underground railroad." Ever at the height of the anti-Vietnam war movement, she contends, there were suspicions but no evidence that government agents joined churches as worshipers to spy.

Baird and her husband, Peter (also a lawyer), are representing the American Lutheran Church, the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., and four Arizona churches that recently filed suit against the federal government, alleging that indiscriminate spying by untrained informers violated constitutional guarantees of separation of church and state, freedom of religion, the right to privacy, protection against unwarranted searches and due process. They charge that the informers were turned loose on churches that were not suspected of any illegal activities and that were not part of the sanctuary movement.

Government use of informers lends credence to a theory that, though career government agents might not be involved directly in burglarizing churches, their informers could be. Jesus Cruz—the smuggler-turned-informer who is the key government witness in the Tucson trial—wasn't given to constitutional niceties.

One of the incidents cited by the churches in their suit against the government involved the Alzona Evangelical Lutheran Church in Phoenix. Pastor James Oines claims that government spying destroyed years of his mission work in the Spanish-speaking community. The church had served Lutherans of mostly northern European descent until the neighborhood changed and the church found itself in the middle of the barrio. Rather than closing the church down, the denomination supported Oines as he engaged in mission work. He started an adult Bible class in Spanish and, over time, 25 people began participating regularly. They focused on the Book of Exodus, with which, Oines says, the Hispanics could identify as they compared their sufferings with that of the ancient Hebrews wandering in the desert in search of the Promised Land.

Posing as a committed Christian, Cruz joined the Bible class in 1984. Over a ten-month period, Oines relates, Cruz befriended others in the class, sympathizing with them, giving them rides home. "He was a good actor," Oines says. Meanwhile, Cruz was secretly tape-recording everything. Then immigration agents swept up about a dozen people in the class as undocumented aliens and, presumably, deported them, Oines says. When Cruz's spying was revealed in pretrial depositions last spring, the rest of the Bible class stopped coming to the Alzona church.

To what extent is the government using spies—lawless types, perhaps, who think nothing of burglarizing places to earn their keep as informers—to infiltrate churches elsewhere? Leaders of the Old Cambridge Baptist Church believe they have proof that the FBI has planted a spy in their midst. They also suspect that the spying may be related in some way to the burglaries. In a letter dated November 11, 1985, the FBI declined to honor Freedom of Information request for its files on the church. Disclosure of the files, the FBI wrote Michael Rattner—an attorney with Center for Constitutional Rights, which has been keeping track of the burglaries—might "reveal the identity of an individual who has furnished information to the FBI under confidential circumstances."

WESTERN DOUBT, SOVIET CERTAINTY

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, in an address on "The Reagan Doctrine and U.S. Foreign Policy," Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick attributed a number of Soviet victories, and concomitant losses to the cause of freedom, to "the marriage of Western doubt and Soviet certainty." That is what we see today in Angola, where over $1 billion worth of new Communist military aid is buttressing some 40,000 foreign Communist troops and advisers and technical specialists in the MPLA's war against the Angolan resistance. America has yet to give any materiel but trucks to Jonas Savimbi and UNITA; more and better aid is now promised, and there are free people everywhere who look forward to its arrival.

Another marriage of Soviet certainty and Western doubt is visible in Nicaragua, where new shipments of military aid of all kinds to the government have been landed by Communist transports, and where the Sandinista armored forces have a new director in Brig. Gen. Nestor Lopez, a veteran of other Communist wars in Cuba, the Middle East, and Angola. Against these implements of Soviet certainty stand the anti-Communist Nicaraguans, victims of Western doubt, who have done without American military aid since June 1984.

It is my hope that when this House votes tomorrow, it will choose to allow the freedom-loving Nicaraguans to fight with more than inspiration. Let us give them the tools, and by themselves, they will finish the job.

Two articulate columns appeared in the press of today which I think my colleagues will find very worthy of their attention. In the Washington Post, Rowland Evans and Robert Novak describe what the transfer of General Lopez means about the war in Nicaragua, and indicates the international scope of that war. In the Wall Street Journal, the editors argue that deception—and self-deception—have been central to the refusal by some Americans to recognize all that is at stake in the conflict. The articles follow.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 19, 1986]

ISRAEL AND THE CONTRAS

(Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

The arrival in Nicaragua last week of a Cuban general who fought against Israel in the 1973 Yom Kippur War is the launching pad for a new political effort to win the contra-aid vote in Congress on grounds that a vote against the contras is a vote against Israel.

Brig. Gen. Nestor Lopez, the Soviet-trained Cuban commander who is just now making his debut in Nicaragua, commanded armored forces on the Syrian front against Israel and then stayed there for two more years. His move to Managua buttresses the administration's charge that a seamless web of left-wing forces now spans the globe, with the capability of pinpointing its power where and when needed.

According to that theory, Lopez's battle experience in one theater of operations after another shows the capability of moving non-Soviet communist forces led by Soviet-trained officers into combat almost anywhere. The troops that fight on the Honduran border today may return to the Israeli border tomorrow.

Republican supporters of anticommunist guerrillas in Nicaragua believe there is political advantage to be taken of this, particularly with many Democratic congressmen who vote consistently for aid to Israel but against the contras. Rep. Newt Gingrich plans to get a group of coleagues together for trips to New York, Chicago and Miami—all major centers of Jewish population—to deliver this message: a "no" vote on aid to the contras is a "yes" vote for the enemies of Israel who fought in the Yom Kippur War on the Arab side.

Lopez was one of them. Indeed, at age 44 he typifies the Cuban communist professional who has made his mark in three theaters of war. A youthful fighter against the Batista regime in Cuba, he was trained at armor school in the Soviet Union. When the ill-fated freedom fighters landed at the Bay of Pigs in the spring of 1961, Lopez commanded one of the first Fidel Castro units to meet them.

In 1973, he was sent to the Mideast in command of an armored regiment fighting with the Syrians against Israel along the Golan Heights, staying there throughout sporadic cleanup fighting that lasted into May 1974. All told, 3,000 Cubans were estimated to have been in Syria—including MiG and helicopter pilots.

According to The Economists's March 1978 Foreign Report, Cuban tank crews commanded by Lopez suffered 180 dead and 250 wounded in the Yom Kippur war. Less than a year later, in March 1975, the Cubans were dispatched to Angola to battle Jonas Savimbi's freedom fighters following Portugal's departure. Lopez was put in command of a Cuban armored division.

Thus, while Washington sends one of its veteran peace-seeking envoys, Ambassador Philip Habib, to Central America, Havana sends one of its outstanding combat veterans to Managua.

The Nicaraguan government's pleas for peace, echoed by Reagan critics in Washington, contrast with such warlike moves. Comandante Emmet Lang, the Nicaraguan air force commander in chief, is on a secret mission to Moscow seeking a favorable sign from the Soviets—such as the loan of MiG fighters, or perhaps the symbolic landing of a squadron of Bear bombers.

U.S. experts very much doubt the Sandinistas will get any such stakes-raising signal from the Soviets. But even without the Russians, internationalization of the communist struggle in Nicaragua is well along.

The globe-trotting Gen. Lopez shows what military analyst Edward N. Luttwak meant when he wrote that "the pieces are on the chessboard"—in the Middle East and elsewhere.

Tying Israel and the contras together politically is not all that easy. Formidable Democratic spokesmen in foreign affairs, including Rep. Mel Levine of California, chairman of the House Democratic task force on Central America, and Rep. Stephen J. Solarz of New York, a senior member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, support Israel and oppose the contras with nearly equal passion.

Gingrich and his colleagues will try to convince them they will not be able to perform that feat with impunity much longer. Levine acknowledged to us that the apparent contradiction made him "uncomfortable." But he said "the tail should not wag the dog"—that giving Israel what it asks is not the same as supplying arms to the anti-Sandinista contras.

Gingrich will try to change that, raising the political cost of opposing the contras. The arrival in Managua of the Cuban general with his battle ribbons from the Syrian front helps his cause.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 19, 1986]

INTELLIGENCE FAILURE

Tomorrow the House will vote on President Reagan's request for military aid to the contras in Nicaragua. It will be a somber day whichever way the vote goes. The past few weeks' debate about Central America has unearthed a vast amount of ignorance and arrogance about how the world works and what Americans must do to defend themselves and their values.

A couple of weeks ago CIA Director William Casey said that Nicaragua's Sandinista government was waging a disinformation campaign aimed at the congressmen who would soon vote on contra aid. The White House said it would release a declassified version of the details.

From the Hill came the roar of congressmen outraged at the suggestion that they could be duped by a foreign government. Then the Washington Post sprang forward with a scoop: Mr. Casey's "disinformation campaign" was actually just some consultants to the Sandinistas proposing a publicity blitz with "language and tactics similar to those of many other legislative lobbying campaigns."

You get the clever message? The Sandinista campaign is a legitimate lobbying effort. It is the administration's attempt to discredit it that constitutes the deception. The White House decided not to release its information after all.

After a while, you grow numb. Last night, public television's documentary program "Frontline" scheduled a pre-vote film about the contras titled "Who's Running This War?" The production had so much political spin on it that it almost achieved orbit. In the film, contra leaders were Somocistas. The troops were bloodthirsty and ineffectual. Their U.S. supporters were bizarre right-wingers.

We have gotten used to this stuff, but recently there has been a fresh shock. As Michael Ledeen details nearby, Alvaro Baldizon is a former Sandinista official who defected and came to this country eight months ago. Before his defection he served as chief investigator to the minister of the interior, Tomas Borge. Mr. Baldizon says he investigated, among other things, international charges of human-rights abuse by the Sandinistas, to help the government answer them. He saw some of the innermost workings of the regime.

In the United States Mr. Baldizon has been telling his story. Each new question asked of him elicits more tales of murder, terror and deception. A couple of weeks ago Mr. Baldizon, answering one question, mentioned that he had direct knowledge of Sandinista soldiers disguising themselves as contras and committing atrocities in the contras' name. They were specially trained in East Germany. One group of them, said Mr. Baldizon, posed as counterrevolutionary peasants, killing Sandinista collaborators to prove their authenticity. They would join genuine contra bands, and in camp at night they would slit the throats of their new comrades-in-arms. The literature on communist military campaigns since World War II alludes to similar deceptions, but seldom has anyone come forth claiming firsthand knowledge of such events in progress. Yet Mr. Baldizon's revelations have hardly caused a ripple in the public debate.

Mr. Baldizon's charges could of course be spurious, even though some of his other claims, as Mr. Ledeen reports, have been checked against the findings of human-rights groups. He has named names, dates and places.

If his charges are true, the current debate about Nicaragua has been just a schoolchild's exercise, because the "facts" that people think they know have been manipulated with a deliberateness that we literally cannot imagine. No one has to believe Mr. Baldizon, but it is a remarkable phenomenon when, in the midst of a roaring debate, his charges are treated as if they were never made. This failing is part of a bigger one. Americans are truly innocent. There are some kinds of evil that we simply cannot believe, especially when disbelief is convenient for us.

We are used to open political debate. We hate clandestine manipulation because it robs us of the reliable information that makes open debate possible. When we are told that such manipulation exists, we desperately try to avoid knowing it, so that we will not have to face its complications.

It took a long time to convince people of the reality of the Holocaust. It took a long time for people to believe the horror of the Khmer Rouge. So far the United States has been lucky, and has made up for such failures of intelligence. But no one is lucky forever, and persisting in this self-satisfied ignorance could sooner or later be fatal.

FLOOD CONTROL PROJECT SUPPORTED

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate is expected to consider and pass, according to published reports, its version of a water resources development bill that includes authorization for the construction of a flood control project at Rowlesburg, WV.

This facility, if built, would control flooding along both the Cheat River in West Virginia and the Monongahela River in western Pennsylvania.

Ironically, the importance of this structure to the people who live and the communities which are located along the banks of these two rivers was underscored at the very time the House was passing its water resources development bill that deauthorized the Rowlesburg project.

That occurred during the first week of last November, when the Cheat and "Mon" Rivers were wreaking havoc in the worst flooding incident in decades. Several lives were lost, more than 2,800 families were severely impacted by the floodwaters, nearly 2,600 homes were destroyed or damaged, real property damage exceeded $36 million while the economic loss has been calculated in excess of $21 million.

As a result of that tragic event, individuals and groups, private citizens as well as elected officials on the local, county, State, and Federal level, are urging the Congress to reauthorize the construction of the Rowlesburg flood control project.

We, in the House, will have that chance when conferees are named to work out a compromise between our version and the Senate's version of the water resources development bill.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert the text of a formal resolution recently adopted by the Westmoreland Conservation District in western Pennsylvania. I urge my colleagues to read it and, when the time comes, support our efforts to build a facility to protect the lives and properties of those citizens of Pennsylvania and West Virginia who live in the Monongahela River watershed.

RESOLUTION—ROWLESBURG LAKE PROJECT

Whereas, the Omnibus Flood Control Act was passed by the U.S. Congress in June 1936; and

Whereas, the United States Government adopted a federal policy with respect to the control of floods; and

Whereas, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has been delegated the responsibility for determing the need and construction of flood control projects for the purpose of reducing damage caused by flooding.

Whereas, Stonewall Jackson Lake and Rowlesburg Lake flood control projects were authorized by Congress following the devastating flood events along the Monongahela River in 1952, 1967, 1972, and 1979; and

Whereas, construction started on Stonewall Jackson in July of 1983 at a cost of 200 million dollars and is scheduled to be placed in operation in late 1986; and

Whereas, the Rowlesburg Lake project which would have provided two to three times as much flood protection as Stonewall Jackson Lake was estimated to cost 233 million in 1976 was dropped to an inactive status; and

Whereas, the flood that occurred on November 5, 1985 caused extensive damage and loss of life that devastated the communities of Rowlesburg and Albright in the state of West Virginia and the "Mon" River communities in Allegheny, Fayette, Green, Somerset, Washington, and Westmoreland counties in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and

Whereas, several lives were lost, 2,822 families were severly impacted by the flooding, 2,594 homes were destroyed or damaged in the six Pennsylvania counties; and

Whereas, real property damage exceeded 36 million dollars in the region and the upper pool of the Monongahela River at Maxwell Lock and Dam was closed to shipping for 42 days (November 5, 1985–December 16, 1985) which accounted for an economic loss in excess of 21 million dollars.

Now, Therefore, be it Resolved, that the Directors of the Westmoreland Conservation District support West Virginia Governor Arch A. Moore's petition to have the status of the Rowlesburg Lake project located in the West Virginia section of the Monongahela River Watershed changed from the inactive to the active status. Said status change will permit the resumption of studies on the Rowlesburg Lake Project that could lead to it's construction.

Be it further Resolved, that the Directors of the Westmoreland Conservation District petitions the Congress of the United States to appropriate the necessary funds now estimated at 400 million dollars to construct the authorized Rowlesburg Lake Flood Protection Project. Said projects construction will substantially reduce flood damage and loss of life to the citizens of Pennsylvania and West Virginia who live in the Monongahela River Watershed. Said construction will also help protect and promote this vital industrial region that is now experiencing severe economic dislocation.

Be it further Resolved that copies of this Resolution be sent to U.S. Senators H. John Heinz and Arlen Specter and U.S. Congressmen John P. Murtha, Joseph M. Gaydos, Joseph P. Kolter and Governors Richard D. Thornburgh of Pennsylvania and Arch A. Moore, Jr. of West Virginia.

Adopted the 26th day of February, 1986 in Greensburg, Pennsylvania.

For the Westmoreland Conservation District Board of Directors

J. ROY HOUSTON,
Chairman for the Board of Directors.

Each year, every high school in my district has the option of selecting one student to participate in this program. A nonpartisan board of directors chooses the participant out of numerous applicants. I wish to congratulate these students and commend them on their enthusiasm. Throughout this week, they will have occasion to view the Government in action by observing many facets of the democratic process.

My special thanks to Senators RICHARD LUGAR and DAN QUAYLE and my colleagues BUDDY ROEMER, DALE KILDEE, MICKEY LELAND, JAN MEYERS, JACK FIELDS, and BUD HILLIS for taking time from their busy schedules to speak to these young people.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Congressional Student Program provides an excellent opportunity to these outstanding young men and women to explore Washington, DC, and learn more about how our Government works. They will be able to visit the historic sites in Washington as well as observe the people who serve our country. I hope that the participation in this week's program will one day encourage these students to become active in government and civic service.

Again, it is with delight that I welcome these very special Hoosiers to Washington.

OUR POSTAL SERVICE

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, we have become so accustomed to the service provided by the U.S. Postal Service that too many times we take the service for granted. Moreover, the Postal Service is too often subject to undeserved criticisms. But every day there are thousands of postal employees who faithfully carry out their duties so that our Nation can run a little more smoothly.

I would like to take this opportunity to say that we should be proud of our Nation's Postal Service. Recently, the Washington Post conducted an informal survey on how long it takes for mail to be delivered from one place to another. The following is an article (Washington Post, March 18, 1986) which describes the survey and details how a letter is in fact delivered. I hope that this article can lead us to be more appreciative of the important service the Postal Service provides for all of us.

MAIL DELIVERY SCORES HIGH IN TEST

(By James Schwartz)

Once a letter is placed in a mailbox, it's in the care of the U.S. Postal Service, the gargantuan organization (765,666 employees, 39,327 post offices and stations) that last year confronted rain, heat and gloom of night to deliver 140 billion pieces of mail.

How effective are the U.S. mails? The Washington Post conducted an informal survey to answer this question, and the accompanying map illustrates the results.

Letters were deposited in local mailboxes at noon in mid-February in seven cities around the nation and sent to The Post in Washington. Letters were mailed simultaneously from the District of Columbia to the same seven cities. None of the letters was lost or damaged. All arrived within four days, despite the fact that February is second only to the weeks around Christmas as a high-volume mailing period.

In each case, both a typewritten and a handwritten envelope were mailed, to test whether handwritten mail moves more slowly through the heavily automated system.

For a piece of mail to get from here to there, it follows a route worthy of Rube Goldberg. According to George Conrad, public affairs officer for the Washington, D.C., Post Office, mail is collected by a postal collection driver or a dispatch driver and taken to a Management Sectional Center. There nonmetered mail is postmarked (or "canceled") and "faced," a procedure in which envelopes are placed in uniform position, with addresses right side up and stamps in the upper right-hand corner. Metered mail does not require cancellation.

From "postmarking," letters go to "sorting," where they are sorted by the first three numbers of their zip codes. Most mail then is processed by a Letter Sorting Machine (LSM), a $250,000 device boasting 12 consoles from which operators direct the flow of mail. Letters mailed with mechanically printed addresses pass the LSM and go directly to Optical Character Readers (OCRs), which actually read addresses and direct the mail to the correct zip code. Both machines process approximately 30,000 pieces of mail per hour.

The 15 percent to 20 percent of the mail that cannot be handled by OCRs or LSMs is sorted manually.

Sorted mail is dispatched to the Management Sectional Center at the destined zip code. Here the mail is sorted once more, this time according to address. It then is delivered by a local carrier.

Postal Service spokeman Lou Eberhardt said the U.S. system ranks among the world's best, but that comparison is difficult: "[Other systems] are basically delivering mail in what amounts to countries the size of one of our states. So that while the English and West German systems are very good, you have to be aware of the caveat: England is not as big as Texas."

SANDINISTAS AND THE JEWISH COMMUNITY

HON. VIN WEBER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues a letter that I received from prominent Jewish leaders expressing strong support for the President's aid request to the Nicaraguan democratic resistance.

The list of signers includes not only members of the National Jewish Coalition, but also nationally well-known persons who are leaders in their communities.

We all know of the attacks on the Jewish community during the first years of Sandinista rule: The Firebombing of Managua's synagogue, the seizing of Jewish-owned property, the growing anti-Semitic print.

Yet, little attention has been given to the ties between the Sandinistas and the PLO's Yasir Arafat and Libya's Muammar Qadhafi. Libya has given $400 million in military aid to Nicaragua as well as assistance in the training of their political police. The cause of the PLO has been welcomed as the "cause of the Sandinistas." Managua has become a terrorist haven.

I urge my colleagues to give serious attention to this letter. The fight for freedom in Nicaragua is real. I believe it is apparent what side the Sandinistas have joined.

MARCH 18, 1986.

Hon. VIN WEBER,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. WEBER: We write to you as Americans concerned about the growing threat to U.S. strategic interests in Central America. Our concern is heightened by the increasing Soviet-supplied arsenal being accumulated by the Sandinista government of Nicaragua, and by the Sandinistas' willingness to export this weaponry to anti-democratic forces throughout Latin America.

We watched as the Sandinistas joined enemies of the West to provide a beachhead for the Soviet Union in Central America. We have also witnessed the Sandinistas' support for revolutionaries in Latin America and beyond.

We watched with dismay as Nicaragua's Jewish community suffered under Sandinista rule. In 1978, Sandinista gunmen firebombed Managua's synagogue. Individual Jews were hounded until, by 1981 they had fled the country, fearing for their lives. The anti-Semitism continued even after the Jews had left. Jewish-owned property was seized, and in July, 1982, the government-approved press referred to "synagogues of Satan" and resurrected the calumny that "the world's money, banking and finance are in the hands of descendants of Jews."

Prominent among the Sandinistas' allies are the PLO's Yasir Arafat and Libya's Muammar Qadhafi. In a 1980 speech, Interior Minister Tomas Borge praised the relationship between Nicaragua and the PLO, pledging that "the PLO cause is the cause of the Sandinistas." In addition, over the past four years, Libya has provided the Sandinistas with $400 million in aid, and now helps to train the Sandinistas' political police.

The anti-Semitism in Nicaragua is a reflection of the repression inherent in the Marxist-Leninist society the Sandinistas seek to establish. Furthermore, the Sandinistas' ties to Libya and the PLO exemplify the support that the Managua regime gives to the world's terrorist groups.

We cannot remain silent as Nicaragua denies human rights at home while attempting to undermine democracy abroad. Many victims of this government have taken up arms in the hope of wresting power from the Sandinistas and of establishing freedom and democracy where dictatorship now rules.

We support a negotiated settlement to this conflict. But we recognize that, at this time, unless the United States aids the democratic forces, the Sandinistas will continue to resist the establishment in Nicaragua of a pluralistic, democratic society. We therefore urge that, in the interests of freedom, democracy and our own security, you support the administration's request for aid to the anti-Sandinista resistence.

Sincerely,

Signed (in formation) [1]

THROWING AWAY THE CLOCK

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, for those colleagues of mine who are growing older—cheer up. There is a more positive side—thanks to the observations and opinion of Suzanne Fields, a columnist for the Washington Times.

THROWING AWAY THE CLOCK

It's not a bad time to be growing older in. Our age isn't like the Age of Aquarius, when older people were stigmatized by the younger, simply for knowing more.

Poverty among the elderly is down. Political clout is up. The average life expectancy is on the increase and is now 74. The status of older people in the work place is higher, too.

Gray is good, and getting better.

A survey of employers in 400 corporations shows how experience, knowledge, and skills developed by older workers pay off in business. Worker over 50 get high evaluations in performance and productivity because they have a commitment to high quality.

Older employees are punctual, have good attendance rates, and are "cost-effective." Their higher salaries and benefits are offset by value produced, according to research conducted by Yankelovich, Skelly & White Inc. for the American Association of Retired Persons. Older workers are perceived as less flexible and less able to adapt to new technology, but most employers say that training can overcome these weaknesses.

[1] Organization and affilation listed for identification only.

Everyone who hopes to get old—and most do, given the alternative—has a vested interest in surveys like this. Its timing, however, also reflects major changes going on in our society. Since World War II, men and women over 50 have been a declining element in the work force. But, only a decade from now, the first of the baby boomers will enter their 50s, and older workers will begin to increase.

As the number of older workers grows, the number of young people going to work is declining, and soon there may be acute labor shortages in certain occupations. If older workers are to be encouraged to stay on the job, it helps to build trust in their competence now. And as baby boomers worry whether there will be enough left in the retirement funds to support their yuppie lifestyle, they can take some consolation in the fact that they can continue to work (to keep up the old BMW) if they want to.

In spite of contemporary aging research that rebuts the idea of an inevitable mental decline in older people, the '80s business climate has been characterized as "lean and mean," with corporations frequently offering older people financial incentives to bid a premature farewell to the gang around the water cooler. While many of these packages are "too good to refuse," some retirees quickly learn that all that lesiure time is a snare and a delusion. For a lot of people, retirement is the pits.

What we have now is a "New Realism" in business, say researchers who interviewed corporate employers to learn their attitudes toward older workers. Older workers can stay on the job, but they have to prove themselves to be up to the work, and they must carry their own weight, which means they must perform.

In the 1950s, the work contract was rooted in the Protestant work ethic, and employees were expected to sacrifice for the benefit of company. This is what Arthur Miller was railing against in Death of a Salesman, when Howard, the young boss, tells Wily Loman, 60, that he no longer has a job.

"I put 34 years into this firm, Howard, and now I can't pay my insurance! You can't eat the orange and throw the peel away—a man is not a piece of fruit."

To Howard, that's exactly what Willy was.

Then came the egalitarianism of the 1960s and 1970s, and the government and the company "owed" benefits to older employees. Perquisites and entitlements helped many people reduce the poverty that once was the inevitable companion of old age. Between 1959 and 1983, according to government figures, poverty among the aged dropped from 55 percent to 14.1 percent. This decrease in poverty was partly a result of the congressional formula for linking Social Security increases to inflation, which some economists say "overcompensated" for inflation.

"Congress stands with the elderly because the elderly stand in the polling places," says Rep. George Miller, Democrat of California.

But in the budget-cutting '80s the elderly have to fight harder to get what they believe they deserve. "Older employees hold the keys to their own destiny," say the researchers. Rewards in business are tied less to seniority than directly to performance in what is now characterized as a "reciprocal" arrangement. Older workers must become their own advocates.

In growing older, it helps to borrow attitudes and outlook from creative artists who have lived into their seventh, eighth, and ninth decades, and who cannot think of life without work.

Laurence Olivier played a memorable King Lear when he was 77, impersonating a man several years older then he was with the energy required of someone several years younger. Robert Penn Warren has been writing poetry, criticism, and fiction for 60 years, and at 80, still in the ink, he becomes our first poet laureate. Martha Graham, 91, no longer dances, but she choreographs dances and directs the dancers. Georgia O'Keeffe, who died last week at 98, worked to the end. When her sight failed, she stopped painting and began modeling in clay.

Keeping occupied and active, of course, keeps a person feeling younger. People who are written up in Who's Who live longer than people who aren't.

After Malcolm Cowley, the literary critic, who is 87, wrote a charming book called The View From 80, many readers demanded that he write a sequel, The View from 90. He may do it. He tells of a friend close to his age who lacks his sanguine attitude about the golden years. "The best part of your day is over," says his friend, "when the alarm clock rings."

So Mr. Cowley and Martha Graham and Robert Penn Warren threw away the clock. There's a lesson for us all there.

FUTURE OF THE DOMESTIC STEEL INDUSTRY

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, in 1984, Congress devoted a considerable amount of its attention to the future of the domestic steel industry. Of particular concern was the plight of the thousands of dislocated steelworkers, and the International Trade Commission's finding that increased imports were a significant injury to the industry.

Congress overwhelmingly expressed its sentiment in the Steel Import Stabilization Act of 1984. Congress granted the authority for enforcing trade restrictions on imports, and tied that relief to increased modernization and worker retraining. Ways and Means Chairman DAN ROSTENKOWSKI was instrumental in this effort. Without his assistance, the steel industry today would be facing a floodtide of imports.

In its work to assure passage of the bill and compliance with its provisions, the Congressional Steel Caucus was greatly aided by Lynn Williams of the United Steelworkers of America.

Last week in testimony before the steel caucus, Commerce Secretary Baldrige acknowledged that without this steel program, imports today "would be through the roof." He agreed that Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI, Lynn Williams, and the steel caucus deserve credit for establishing the effort that has halted the trend of skyrocketing imports. Clearly, gains still need to be made; but the trend has been reversed.

At this point, I would like to submit into the RECORD the testimony of Secretary Baldrige.

STATEMENT OF MALCOLM BALDRIGE, SECRETARY OF COMMERCE, BEFORE THE CONGRESSIONAL STEEL CAUCUS EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, thank you for allowing me this opportunity to meet with you today. We are pleased to report that the President's steel program is working. We have maintained from the outset that fourth quarter 1985 Census import data would begin to show the real effectiveness of the President's program.

Fourth quarter 1985 imports were the lowest since the program began. Imports from arrangement countries fell 23 percent from 1984. Fourth quarter import penetration dropped from 28.4 percent in 1984 to 22.7 percent in 1985.

1986 looks even more promising. January imports fell 19 percent from December 1985 and 34 percent from January 1985. Import penetration fell from 30.9 percent in January 1985 to 21.6 percent in January 1986. For the first nine weeks of this year, raw steel production rose 11 percent and capability utilization is up 9.1 percentage points.

The steel program has helped to create the necessary conditions for the domestic industry to begin to recapture market share and regain international price competitiveness. It is crucial that our industry continue to move ahead because steel is our nation's basic metal. Its future affects not only steelworkers and their communities, but each of us here today as well. The construction, automotive, oil and gas, machinery, and capital goods industries are only a few of the key sectors of our economy that look to a healthy and competitive steel industry as being a critical determinant of their own competitiveness.

For these and other reasons, the Administration is firmly committed to the vigorous enforcement of the bilateral steel export restraint arrangements, which are a central part of the President's overall program. These arrangements provide the domestic industry with relief from unfair surges in steel imports, while avoiding the economic costs associated with traditional quota systems.

We now have arrangements with 17 countries plus an extended and expanded version of our 1982 arrangements with the EC. With the conclusion of the December exchange of letters on finished EC steel products and the imposition of quotas on semi-finished products, we now have brought all EC steel imports under control.

Each of the 18 arrangements was carefully designed to accommodate the commercial needs of U.S. and foreign businesses, while ensuring full compliance with the terms and levels of restraint agreed upon. A double check enforcement mechanism is built into each arrangement to provide fail-safe control over steel imported into the United States. Arrangement country exporters must have a license to export, and their shipments must be accompanied by a valid, original export certificate to be entered for comsumption into a U.S. Foreign Trade Zone or U.S. Customs Territory.

We work closely with the U.S. Customs Service to ensure that every ton is accounted for in our records, and that not one ounce of steel that needs a certificate enters the United States without one. As an added precaution, we examine each transaction through the chain of producer, seller, importer, and U.S. buyer to detect transshipments through non-arrangement countries.

Any information that suggests the possibility of fraudulent activity is immediately turned over to U.S. Customs for investigation. We also notify the respective foreign government so it can take the appropriate action. To date, we have found very few cases.

Import penetration levels in the first full year of the program were above the President's announced goal because the arrangements were not designed in a way that would yield quick results in our official statistics. Although the President's program technically began on October 1, 1984, staggered export licensing deadlines and transportation and reporting time lags explain much of the delay in 1985's import declines. Import figures for the first half of 1985 included tonnage actually imported before the President's program took effect, and licensing for many countries began.

In announcing the steel program, the President indicated that it was the Administration's hope that the program would lead to import penetration levels of 18.5 percent for finished steel. However, the President's program is not global quotas, and the 18.5 percent market share figure for finished steel is not a guarantee. Instead, this figure represented an estimate of likely import levels when the program was fully implemented.

To the extent that negotiated market share levels exceed the original estimates set forth in the President's program, the U.S. industry was fully aware of the terms of each arrangement. No arrangement could be concluded until the U.S. industry agreed to withdraw all AD and CVD cases and orders against the country.

Now that the arrangements are in place, we will see further declines in steel imports. Import levels in 1986 will decrease because excess, pre-licensed shipments from arrangement countries during the October 1984 to December 1985 period will be deducted from 1986 export ceilings. The EC will also be lower in 1986, as the new arrangement and semis import quotas take full effect.

As the overall trends improve, we also are taking steps to ensure that foreign governments adhere strictly to any special terms or provisions contained in their arrangements. Each arrangement provides for the creation of new product categories if the product mix of exports shifts within an existing category, significantly exceeding preagreed levels. The domestic industry has applauded the results gained through our tough stance in recent consultations with Japan, Korea, and Brazil concerning this provision.

Japan agreed to break our four new subcategories, including electrical sheet and strip, a major concern of the domestic industry. Each new sub-category has a specific export ceiling, effective as of January 1, 1986. Japan will also reduce exports in four other sensitive product areas. These products will be immediately broken out as separate sub-categories if exports exceed agreed benchmark levels.

As a result of our talks with Korea, we concluded a memorandum of understanding concerning standard pipe. Korea agreed to cut its standard pipe exports to historical levels, 38 percent below the peak third quarter 1985 rate. If Korean standard pipe exports exceed this amount, a separate subcategory will automatically be broken out immediately.

Brazil has agreed to break out electrical sheet and strip as a sub-category, with an export ceiling equal to 3 percent of the Other Sheet and Strip category's ceiling. This level is an 83 percent decrease from 1985 imports of electrical sheet and strip from Brazil. Other products in which shifts may be developing are being addressed in consultations with Brazil this week.

Beyond enforcing the explicit terms of each arrangment, we are always on the lookout for transshipments and other activities that are intended to circumvent the program and its overall goals. We recently sent letters to all signatory countries advising them of our intention to enforce the terms and objectives of the arrangements with respect to third country processing of steel from arrangement countries destined for consumption in the United States. These letters put countries on notice that we will not stand by and see the objectives of the President's steel program thwarted.

The President's program is a success. It already has shown its effectiveness in reducing import levels. However, its continued success rests upon the cooperation and effort of all parties involved. It is essential that the U.S. industry use the remaining years of the program to restructure, modernize, and adjust to the new landscape of global steel trade.

The industry is making important strides to reduce overcapacity, cut costs, and raise productivity. Operating costs per ton have fallen 17 percent since 1982. Over the same period, employment costs have been reduced by 35 percent and have dropped from a third of total operating costs to a quarter. U.S. steel workers are now among the most productive in the world. Man-hours per ton of steel shipped fell 20 percent from an average of 5.5 in 1982-1984 to 4.4 in the first eleven months of 1985.

Continued efforts along these lines will have to be made, and the steel trade arrangements are helping to create the necessary conditions for the industry to move ahead. Demand for flat rolled products has been strong, bringing with it some strengthening in prices. In the week ending February 15, incoming orders for flat rolled steel were equivalent to 98 percent of the industry's capacity, and recent reports show that flat rolled steel prices for second quarter delivery are now up about 8 percent from late 1985 levels. The industry's overall operating rate through the first nine weeks of this year was 70.5 percent, compared to 61.4 percent for the same weeks last year. Raw steel production rose from 13.6 million tons for these weeks in 1985 to 15.1 million tons this year.

Steady progress is being made but we are not out of the woods yet. As the President's program continues, this Administration will ensure that the industry has a full and fair opportunity to regain its competitive footing.

THE "NO-CARE ZONE"

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleagues attention to an article that appeared in the medicine section of Time magazine for March 24. The story, about the premature discharge of Medicare patients, is illustrated with a drawing of an elderly man in a hospital bed staring anxiously at a parking meter beside his bed. There is very little time left on the meter.

This is not the first time I have seen this frightening image used to portray the impact the Medicare DRG system has had on hospital care for senior citizens. We must enact comprehensive reform to assure quality care for the Nation's senior citizens.

As a first step, I introduced H.R. 4275, the Medicare Discharge Appeals Opportunity Act, on February 27. This bill will require peer review organizations to complete a discharge review before the 48-hour grace period on Medicare coverage expires. At present, few appeals are filed because the PRO's may take up to 3 working days to process them and the patient is responsible for the additional hospital charges if the appeal is denied. Strengthening the right to appeal will help protect those who might otherwise be discharged although they remain acutely ill. I am pleased that 19 of my colleagues have joined me in support of H.R. 4275.

More comprehensive legislation will be needed to assure suitable care for those who can safely be discharged from the hospital but need nursing home or home care. Congress must begin now to eliminate the "No-Care Zone" described in this article.

The article follows:

WELCOME TO THE "NO-CARE ZONE"—AFTER REFORM, CONCERN ABOUT NEW KINDS OF MEDICARE ABUSE

(By Claudia Wallis)

In Washington, a doctor is summoned from his dinner by a hospital nurse who tells him that one of his patients, a 72-year-old woman suffering from respiratory failure, has exhausted her allotment of Medicare funding. The further cost of her care must come out of the hospital's own pocket, says the nurse. Could he discharge the woman that evening?

In Knoxville, a 70-year-old woman with diabetes, gallstones and signs of congestive heart failure decides after a week in the hospital not to have gallbladder surgery. The hospital insists that she be sent home, despite her frail condition. "It was a mistake," says Dr. Bergein Overholt. "Within twelve hours she was back in the hospital in a prestroke condition. It was touch and go to save her."

At hospitals across the U.S., similar tales of callous and even life-threatening treatment apparently stemming from changes in the Medicare system seem to be cropping up with disturbing frequency. To concerned doctors and health-care groups, they reflect a growing gap in the American health-care system. Carroll Estes, director of the Institute for Health and Aging at the University of California, San Francisco, calls it the "no-care zone."

In January, Estes' institute released the results of a three-year study concluding that Medicare patients are being released "sicker and quicker" from the nation's hospitals. The study, which examined medical care in 32 communities in eight states, found that the newly ousted patients, still in need of treatment, often have nowhere else to turn for help.

The problem began three years ago, after a major reform of Medicare. Under its earlier provisions, the plan, which covers the health-care costs of citizens who are over age 65 or disabled, paid for all "reasonable" hospital expenses. By the late '70s, however, this blank-check approach had led to a dizzying 17% annual increase in Medicare's hospitalization costs and warnings that the system would be bankrupt by 1990.

To forestall disaster, the rules were changed in 1983. A patient's ailment is now assigned to one of 470 diagnosis-related groups, which categorize treatment for everything from appendicitis to viral meningitis. Each DRG carries a fixed reimbursement rate based on the cost of treating the average patient. If a hospital can treat a patient for less than the DRG rate, it can keep the change; if the patient's care exceeds the ceiling, the hospital absorbs the loss. In theory, hospitals will lose money on complicated cases and save on simpler ones, and Medicare costs will be brought under control.

In financial terms, the DRG system appears to be working. It has helped limit the annual increase in hospital costs to 5% and reduced the average hospital stay for Medicare patients from 9.5 days in 1983 to 7.5 days last year. Many private insurers have introduced DRG systems of their own. Says Jack Owen, executive vice president of the American Hospital Association: "The DRGs have created efficiency and economy."

But they have had a less salutary effect on many patients. The Washington-based American Association of Retired Persons has received hundreds of letters from patients who claim they were kicked out of hospitals prematurely. "Some still had high temperatures, draining wounds, and were feeling terrible." says Barbara Herzog, director of AARP's health-care campaign. "Many had no one to care for them properly at home and could not get admission into a nursing home."

A study last year by the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging uncovered other problems. The committee found that some hospitals post lists of "bad doctors," who allow hospitalized patients to exceed the DRG ceiling, and of "good doctors," who boost hospital profits by discharging their patients quickly. Physicians reported they were under pressure not to admit complicated cases that might prove costly to treat. And, at seven hospitals operated by the Paracelsus Health Care Corp. of Pasadena, Calif., doctors receive bonuses if costs are kept within DRG range. This practice is now under federal investigation.

Health and Human Services Secretary Otis Bowen insists that Medicare beneficiaries "continue to receive the best-quality care available." While HHS has received 4,700 complaints about Medicare abuse related to DRGs, he says, there is no evidence of "any systematic increase in premature discharges." Nonetheless, Bowen last month announced that upon admission to a hospital, Medicare patients will soon receive a statement explaining their rights, including the right to appeal a discharge decision.

Even critics of Medicare policies concede that it often makes sense to release patients from $300-a-day hospitals and transfer them to $65-a-day nursing homes or even less costly home care. But, says Dr. T. Reginald Harris, president of the American Society of Internal Medicine, these cheaper alternatives are not always available, and Medicare skimps on paying for them. Meanwhile, he notes, hospitals say, "It's not our problem."

Republican Senator John Heinz of Pennsylvania is planning to introduce a bill in Congress that would compel hospitals to arrange suitable follow-up care for discharged patients and make local Medicare watchdog agencies responsible for supervising such arrangements. A report to be released later this month by Harvard's Center for Health Policy and Management proposes a more radical solution: revising the Medicare system so it pays for extended nursing-home stays, home care and other outpatient care. Such reform, which could cost $50 billion a year, seems unlikely to win congressional favor in an era of cost cutting. But until something is done to meet the needs of patients evicted from their hospital beds, large numbers will continue to fall into the perious no-care zone.

THE AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS OPPOSES AID TO NICARAGUA

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, at this critical juncture in our Nation's policy toward our neighbors in Central America, it is of utmost importance that the views of our constituents be made clear. I welcome the opportunity to apprise my colleagues of a decision made by the American Jewish Congress, one of the leading Jewish organizations in the United States, to oppose the President's policy toward Nicaragua.

This week, the American Jewish Congress almost unanimously adopted the following resolution condemning the current Contra aid package and the policy approach of this administration toward Nicaragua:

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS 1986 BIENNIAL CONVENTION

Draft resolution: Contras in Nicaragua.

Submitted by: Resolutions committee.

We urge the administration and the Congress to bring an immediate end to our undeclared war against the Government of Nicaragua and to cease supplying money, arms, munitions and political legitimacy to the Contras. Instead, the United States must seek a peaceful political solution to the conflict. It must seek a negotiated solution, preferably through the Contradora process. The United States, and all parties to the conflict, must make a permanent commitment to democratic principles, civil liberties, economic reform and social justice.

TAX REFORM PROPOSALS

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, as we have been reading, hearing and learning more about the tax reform proposals that are being advanced in the other body by the chairman of the Finance Committee, I find that I have a growing concern about what appears to be the centerpiece of the package that is now under consideration. If I am correct in my understanding, legislation is being suggested to deny businesses the right to deduct Federal excise taxes collected for and paid to the Federal Government. This is a totally new concept and a departure from our traditional and well established principles of our system of taxing income.

Such a proposal ignores the basic tenet of tax policy, that the income tax is levied on net income only, not on the cost of goods sold or other operating expenses. Excise taxes have been deductible because these taxes collected by businesses are not the property or income of the taxpayer-collector. To regard the excise taxes paid to a collector as income to the collector would be to impose a tax on a tax.

That such a proposal would be seriously considered causes me great concern. To say that the excise tax payments are not deductible is to increase income subject to tax and this simply is not fair. I say again, it is a tax on a tax. It's just that simple. This can only have serious economic and employment impact throughout the country. It's bound to increase the price of all consumer goods that are already burdened by excise taxes, and we all know that increases in the costs of consumer goods generally cause inflation.

This is not tax reform and I can not accept such a concept. I have so advised the chairman of the Committee on Finance and I want the people in the Second District of Tennessee to know that this is not my concept of tax reform and that whenever I have the opportunity I will be opposing it.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

HON. DANIEL K. AKAKA

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues a speech prepared by one of my constituents, Douglas Kiang. This fine speech was the winning entry from the State of Hawaii in the Veterans of Foreign Wars [VFW] Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program.

The VFW has sponsored the Voice of Democracy Program since 1961. During the past 24 years, over 5 million students have participated in this worthwhile program and more than $3 million in awards have been presented to deserving students. This past year alone saw more than one-quarter million students participating from over 8,000 schools. I commend the VFW for conducting the Voice of Democracy Program and helping students extend their education through this scholarship program.

I am especially proud that the VFW has chosen a resident of the Second Congressional District as Hawaii's winning entry this year. I am certain you will agree that Douglas Kiang's speech is an excellent representation of this year's theme, "New Horizons for America's Youth":

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

Centuries ago, it was believed that the world was flat; that the world ended at the horizon, or the point beyond which the eye could see no further. Once a ship reached that point, it would fall off the edge of the world and everyone aboard would perish a fiery death at the hands of unknown demons and monsters.

It wasn't until the late 1400's that a sailor named Christopher Columbus sailed over the horizon and made the discovery that there was no impassable barrier beyond the horizon, but instead, an infinite number of horizons beyond the horizon, as many as far as he wished to said to reach the next one.

The courage and the imagination required for Columbus to look beyond the horizon and venture past it could only have been found within himself—for nowhere but within himself could he have found the creativity and the imagination to venture past the limits of his sight.

Similarly, I too have begun to realize that there exists a multitude of New Horizons for America's youth, and that the key to those shining lands of success has been placed within our grasp—as the freedom of imagination.

As Columbus realized five hundred years ago, many times people are limited by what their eyes can or cannot see. It takes a person with imagination to realize that there often lie unexplored worlds far beyond the evident horizon; what the eye can see is very seldom "all that there is".

The same holds true for you and I, America's youth; our country offers not one, but an infinite number of horizons to each of us; an infinite number of goals to be set, and achieved. Our nation not only provides us with these horizons in the form of opportunities, but it also gives us the freedom to realize our own horizons.

This freedom of imagination is indeed one of the greatest freedoms we have. We Americans are free to look in any direction to find new horizons for ourselves to achieve—we can look in the directions of space, or medicine, or bio-technology, or anywhere else we choose to set our sights. All of these offer horizons that we have been given the opportunity to see, vast opportunities, limited only as much as we allow ourselves to limit them, and this is why this freedom is so important to us. For without it, our horizons would lie along one straight and narrow path, offering us only a flat world of limited goals.

However, as today's youth of America, we must ask ourselves what our horizons are. What are our goals? Where do we want to go? What is our idea of personal success? As America's youth we must take full advantage of the freedom that our country has to offer and decide for ourselves where our personal horizons lie and set sail for them, never taking our eyes off our goal. We must also decide what we will do once that goal has been reached. Will we simply fall off the edge of the world and disappear? Or will we instead cast our eyes far out to the next, distant horizon and triumphantly sail on?

Indeed, new horizons for America's youth depends upon us, the individuals. Just about anyone can establish a horizon and sail toward it, but the true test of the individual comes after that first step over the unknown. It has been said that with great freedom comes great responsibility. It is not only our prerogative, but our responsibility to keep pushing our horizons further and further out, constantly increasing our boundaries.

With the incredibly vast ocean that we, as todays youth now find ourselves afloat in, we must set goals for ourselves and keep sailing toward new horizons or risk falling prey to the monsters of stagnation lurking just below the surface of that cool, blue water.

It would seem now that, afloat on the ocean of opportunity, America's youth's only problem may lie in simply deciding in which direction to sail. But, once that goal has been established, you and I will be well on our way towards fully realizing the freedom and opportunities we, as the Youth of America, have been given.

DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, this past January our Nation celebrated the life and work of a great American, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Americans across the country honored Dr. King's memory in many ways—elementary schoolchildren set aside special days to study the meaning of his legacy, blacks and whites joined hands in parades and marches commemorating a turbulent period of growth, civil rights leaders rededicated themselves to resisting the Reagan administration's efforts to turn back the clock on affirmative action and other hard-won social justice gains.

I am especially proud of the efforts made by the staff of the Orange Public Library to ensure that Dr. King's great legacy is passed on to and carried on by our Nation's youth. Thanks to the hard work of Mr. E. David Grice, director of young adult services, and Marvin Scilken, director of the library, Dr. King's message of brotherhood and racial justice will not fade away with the passage of time, but instead will continue to live on in the thoughts and deeds of countless young people he continues to inspire.

As part of Dr. King's birthday celebration, Mr. Grice and Mr Scilken sponsored the Orange Public Library Martin Luther King, Jr., Essay Contest. The contest entrants were asked to write about Dr. King's life and ideals. Ms. Esther Witted, of Orange High School, won the first place prize. Ms. Razon Johnson, of Orange Middle School, won second place honors. Ms. Yolanda Pray, of Orange High School, won third place honors.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to commend to you the following first prize essay written by Ms. Witted, and I join Ms. Witted, her fellow students and the Orange Public Library staff in paying tribute to Dr. King and his dream and in looking forward to the day when his dream will become a reality for all Americans.

DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was born January 15, 1929 in Atlanta, Georgia.

King graduated from Morehouse College and completed advanced studies at Crover Theological Seminary and Boston University. His father and his mother's father were Baptist ministers and he was ordained a minister in 1947. King became the pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery in 1954.

Coretta Scott of Marion, Alabama became his wife in 1953.

Throughout King's life he received many awards and one of them was the Nobel Peace Prize. He received if for leading the negro struggle for equality through nonviolent demonstrations in 1964. As time progressed, King did many other things such as the famous March on Washington. More than 200,000 people marched from the Washington Monument to the Lincoln Memorial.

I am a teenager who wants to look up to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. I describe him as a person who had a dream and carried it out until he was killed. One day he said, "I have a dream," and he not only said it, he lived it. He was not ashamed of his color, his family or how much he had. He didn't care who looked him up and down when he walked down the street. King never put himself down and he never thought he was better than anyone else. I will always appreciate the things Dr. Martin Luther King did and I will never let anyone tell me that he was just a black man with a dream. He was a black man who tried his best to fulfill his dream. If Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. could have a dream then I, Esther Whitted, can have a dream also. A dream of peace, love and equality for everyone. I will always remember Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

RESEARCH MEDICAL CENTER CELEBRATES ITS CENTENNIAL

HON. ALAN WHEAT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, at Research Medical Center, located in Kansas City for 100 years, the changes in medical technology, machinery, and even in its buildings have been astounding. One thing at Research, however, has not changed in the last century: the unequaled commitment and unsurpassed dedication to patient service.

In 1886, a group of prosperous business leaders of German descent organized to create the German Hospital. In 1981, the hospital's name was changed to Research Hospital because of anti-German sentiment aroused in World War I. Started in a frame residence at 23d and Holmes Street, Research Hospital began operating with minimal resources and an inventory that included a stable, two cows, and a tent.

Today, the Research Health Services System encompasses a complex, multimillion-dollar industry. Its resources span two States, including hospitals, occupational health clinics, a psychiatric center and a variety of other facilities and services.

Research Medical Center's century of serving the ill in Kansas City has been marked by a tradition of service and growth. Even in the early 1900's, Research was a pioneer in providing quality health care. In 1911, the hospital boasted the first obstetrics department in a private Kansas City hospital. Two years later, Research was among the first hospitals to have a radiology department.

By 1936, Research Hospital occupied seven buildings, including a diagnostic clinic. But the post-World War II population boom made the hospital's accommodations inadequate. Robert E. Adams, who administered the hospital for 28 years until his retirement in 1981, spearheaded a difficult 10-year effort to build a new hospital.

Groundbreaking began in 1955 for the $12.5 million hospital, but it took 8 long years before the new building was finished at Meyer Boulevard and Prospect. Many believe Mr. Adams has made the greatest contribution to the development of Research Medical Center in the last 100 years. He brought a new dimension to Research by moving the administration and the leadership of the hospital from the board room to the office of the executive director. He emphasized a new style of hospital discipline and management organization, exemplified by a commitment to excellence in the delivery of health care.

The spirit of excellence continues today. In 1979, physicians at Research begin making high-tech house calls to rural hospitals in Missouri and Kansas. Today, the Research physicians make available their expertise and specialized techniques at 35 smaller hospitals and countless nursing homes, doctor's offices, and schools and businesses in rural areas.

Mr. Speaker, the last 100 years at Research has been marked by expansion, growth and a commitment to the delivery of quality care at the lowest possible cost. It truly has been a century of caring.

NINETY PERCENT OF THE PEOPLE IN CENTRAL AMERICA DO NOT SUPPORT U.S. POLICY

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, we keep hearing from the administration that although none of the governments in Central America are willing to state publicly that they support our policy, 90 percent of the people in the region have said in response to a poll that they support U.S. policy. That is simply not true.

The administration quotes a poll conducted last summer by a Gallup affiliate in Costa Rica. I have been unable to find any questions in the poll on whether or not people supported U.S. policy. The participants were asked what general opinion they had of the United States and of several other countries. On the average, over 90 percent of the people polled had a very favorable or somewhat favorable opinion of the United States. That is very different than saying that 90 percent of the people support U.S. policy.

The participants were also asked whether or not they support "assistance to the Contras" and 69 percent of the Costa Ricans polled said yes. But as was argued in an NPR report from Costa Rica yesterday, one needs to put this in the right context: when the poll was conducted last summer, the only assistance provided to the Contras was humanitarian assistance, and therefore, the answers relate to humanitarian assistance and not to the current request. Furthermore, the poll was taken after a border incident that resulted in the death of two Costa Rican civil guardsmen when the anti-Sandinista feeling in the country was very high.

Mr. Speaker, we know now that the administration also has in its possession a more recent poll conducted last November which shows that in answer to the same question, only 39 percent of the people polled said that they support assistance to the Contras. Unfortunately, the administration has refused to make this document available to the public and the press.

This misleading use of data and the selective release of only certain polling information demonstrates that the administration is becoming desperate. It simply cannot name a single country that supports our Contra policy nor can it demonstrate any popular support in Central America.

Mr. Speaker, the administration is clearly alone on this one.

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, March 19, 1986, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

The national debate over the use of racial preference to combat discrimination against minorities has reached a watershed. The Supreme Court will soon decide three major cases involving affirmative action plans, and the Reagan administration is locked in an internal debate over a proposal to eliminate a twenty-year old rule requiring federal contractors to set goals and timetables for hiring minorities. The outcome of this debate, and the court cases, could permanently reshape affirmative action.

For two decades affirmative action has been used to provide equal opportunities for minorities excluded from the workforce because of discrimination. Under affirmative action, employers may not discriminate against any employee or job applicant because of race, sex, religion, or national origin and must take "affirmative actions" to assure that minorities and women are treated fairly. Until recently, Congress, the courts, and presidents supported the use of affirmative action to help minorities in hiring and advancement. It is generally agreed that these programs have brightened the employment picture for minorities. For example, between 1967 and 1983, minority employment in the general workforce grew from 12 percent to 19 percent.

Affirmative action has always been a difficult concept, partly because it is so difficult to apply. The web of judicial decisions on affirmative action is intricate and confusing. Courts do not want to cure discrimination with more discrimination, but neither do they want to undermine affirmative action programs. Although the Supreme Court has ruled illegal the use of rigid quotas, neither the Court nor federal law forbids affirmative action plans that include race among the factors considered. Affirmative action plans appears in many different circumstances, and the lawfulness of a plan often depends on the specifics of the case. The outcome of the cases now in court may clarify the law and define the limits of affirmative action.

Opponents of affirmative action claim that goals and timetables, while meant to be flexible, have in practice become rigid quotas. In their view, quotas and goals help neither minorities nor women in low-salary jobs, they unnecessarily burden employers with paperwork, give minorities and women preferential treatment at the expense of white men, and create new (or reverse) discrimination. They claim that affirmative action stigmatizes those it hopes to aid and undermines their self-respect by suggesting that they cannot succeed without government help. Further, they see job discrimination as a less significant cause of poverty among minorities than other factors: family disintegration, teenage pregnancy, drug addiction, poor nutrition, and inadequate schooling. Also, they argue that affirmative action is unnecessary because the battle for equal opportunities has been won and that discrimination can be fought on a case-by-case basis.

To supporters of affirmative action, these attacks threaten two decades of slow and often painful progress for the employment of minorities. To them, these attacks indicate that the federal government is no longer interested in equity in the work place. They point out that the use of quotas in affirmative action programs has always been illegal, but that goals and timetables have provided a way of measuring progress toward equal opportunity and have helped integrate minorities and women into American life. Without goals and timetables, these groups will continue to lose jobs to less-qualified whites. Although a color-blind society is a worthy goal, it is far from a reality. They also argue that affirmative action works, that many local governments and businesses favor it, and that it strengthens our economy and competitiveness by bringing new sources of talent and creativity into the workforce.

Most of us believe discrimination on the basis of race or sex is wrong, and we favor equal opportunity for everyone. Yet people disagree over how discrimination should be determined. Some argue we should be concerned only with demonstrable discrimination against an individual. Others believe that the best way to show discrimination is to see if an employer's workforce generally reflects the available pool of qualified workers. Those who favor broad remedies to correct such racial or sexual imbalances in an employer's workforce describe them as "goals," while opponents brand them "quotas."

Personally, I do not favor quotas, and I believe that care must be taken that goals do not become rigid quotas to be met. But I also think that without goals and timetables we would be less likely to achieve equal treatment of women and minorities. I do not think government should force employers to meet goals by hiring less-qualified applicants. Because enforcing rigid quotas is easier than determining if recruitment and hiring is done in good faith, affirmative action has sometimes been taken too far. But the total repeal of affirmative action would be a mistake. Affirmative action has brought significant improvement for women and minorities in the work force. The objective has been a level of fair employment that will make all goals and timetables unnecessary, but that day has not yet come. After all, full-time female workers earn only 63 percent as much as males, black unemployment is still more than twice that of whites and the jobless rate exceeds 40 percent for black teenagers.

Undoubtedly there are limits to the effectiveness of affirmative action programs. My sense is that these programs are less effective than they once were. They should not end, but other approaches are needed. I would prefer to attack economic inequality without using preferences. I believe that improved housing and nutrition, better schools, and greater self-help efforts in minority communities are better ways to address inequality, but there has not been enough progress in these areas. We should refine and clarify affirmative action, but not abandon it, with the hope that it will make some contribution to diminishing discrimination.

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which will modify the basis for the determination of deficiency payments for wheat and feed grains.

The 1985 farm bill provides for two payments. The regular deficiency payment is based on the difference between the target price and the statutory loan rate or the average market price during the first 5 months of the marketing year, whichever is higher. In addition, the Secretary of Agriculture has the authority under the law to reduce the loan rate by up to 20 percent. If the Secretary uses this authority, which he has for the 1986 wheat and feed grain crops, the producer is then entitled to another payment. This payment is based on the difference between the statutory loan rate and the new loan rate or the average market price whichever is higher during the entire 12 month marketing year.

For example, the 1986 program for wheat provides for a target price of $4.38 per bushel. The statutory loan rate is $3 providing for a maximum deficiency payment of $1.38. The Secretary did use his authority to drop the loan rate to $2.40 thereby providing for a second deficiency payment with a maximum rate of 60 cents. This deficiency payment is determined by using the market price for the entire marketing year. Therefore, farmers must wait until the end of the marketing year which would be June 1987 for wheat, barley, and oats and October 1987 for corn and sorghum for this final payment.

This planting season many farmers are having a very difficult time generating enough cash and credit to put in a crop and pay their bills. Moreover, considering the present financial stress in American agriculture, deficiency payments will play a very important role in determining whether the farmer will be able to continue to meet financial obligations for the crop year. For these farmers to wait until late 1987 to receive the remainder of their deficiency payments for this year's wheat and feed grain crops does not make sense.

My bill will require all deficiency payments for wheat and feed grains to be determined on the basis of the average market price received during the first 5 months of the marketing year. It will assure the American farmer that deficiency payments will be made on a consistent and timely basis and help him meet the financial obligations of the crop year.

LISA HEMINGWAY, MISSOURI VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNER

HON. GENE TAYLOR

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the Voice of Democracy Essay Contest, sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, has been an outstanding educational program, providing scholarships of more than $3 million over the past 24 years.

I am pleased that a constituent of mine, Lisa Hemingway of Springfield, MO, was adjudged our State's winner. Her winning essay follows:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

Golden rays of sunlight break through the hazy clouds of morning. Soon after daybreak, the space shuttle Discovery is brought into full view by the sun's beacon of light. A countdown begins to set the stage for another journey into space. As Discovery launches into the heavens to explore new galaxies, silent billows of white smoke are left behind. Although this smoke will eventually disappear, it represents a space technology that has constantly progressed since Neil Armstrong's first walk on the moon.

While astronauts probe space, the medical field is probing into new cures for sustaining human life. Picture doctors serving long, laborious hours in the operating rooms. With beads of anxious perspiration on their foreheads, they anticipate the long awaited countdown of medical miracles. The announcement of cures of dreaded diseases and transplants of human hearts, brings murmurs of excitement and thankful prayers to the lips of people around the world.

Still another countdown is in progress. Seated around a long conference table are men and women from around the world. In their explicit discussions, they are seeking to find solutions to the ever arising world problems. Through careful thought, patient response, and deliberate speech, these landmark talks will one day bring the summit of international understanding and world peace.

Today, America's youth stand on the threshold of the rest of their lives. They are able to look over the new horizons of space exploration, medical technology, and world peace. Young peoples' search for new horizons reveals opportunities for excitement, significant personal contributions, and commitment to world peace.

America's youth uniquely contribute to our nations striving fields of excellence by being the primary supporters of space exploration, medical technology and world peace. As they learn about these vital occupational fields, they secure our nation's future. As our nation's youth enter their new horizons, they will replenish these vital fields with new, fresh insights.

America's youth stand on the threshold of the rest of their lives look back on the traditional American values that have sustained them throughout their lives. A search of these eternal values reveals a trust in God, a love of parents and one another, and an allegiance to America, and land of the free.

I represent the youth of America. As a graduating senior, I stand on the threshold of the rest of my life. I am able to forge a new path in front of me and face many new tomorrows. I pledge to go forth determined to meet the challenges of new horizons for America's youth. I pledge to go forth determined to maintain those old and forever enduring values of trust in God, love for others, and freedom for all.

I know that all new horizons must be built upon the solid foundation of old, enduring values. I pledge to go forth determined to sustain the new horizons of space exploration, medical technology, and world peace. As I commit my life to these new horizons, I will be strengthening the foundation of trust in God, love for others, and freedom for all. Most importantly, as an American youth through my new horizons, I will sustain the hope that America will remain the land of the free.

A symbol of that freedom is our beloved Statue of Liberty. She has stood secure in the New York Harbor for 100 years reamaining the universal symbol of America. As we restore the Statue of Liberty, we as a nation, at the same time restore the beliefs she represents. Just as the Statue of Liberty is restored, it is appropriate for America's youth to renew their commitment to old values as they face bright, new horizons.

SAN BERNARDINO VALLEY COLLEGE CELEBRATES ITS 60TH YEAR

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I recognize the anniversary of a fine institution of higher learning in my district. San Bernardino Valley College will soon celebrate its 60th anniversary of serving students from throughout San Bernardino County. In 1926, like many community colleges in California, Valley College was established as a separate entity from the local unified school districts in order to better serve the higher education needs of the community.

The beginnings of Valley College were inauspicious. When first opened in 1926, it claimed but 140 students taught by a faculty of 16, in four buildings situated on 30 acres. The library claimed 1,400 volumes. It is a credit to the community of San Bernardino that today these numbers have grown dramatically. Over 10,000 students now attend classes taught by a faculty of 170 in 18 major buildings on 85 acres. Over 100,000 volumes are now housed in a two-building, multistory library complex.

A real source of pride for Valley College is the Public Broadcasting Services affiliate, KVCR-TV, which is housed on campus and owned by the college district. This PBS facility was the first television station owned by a community college in the Nation, and offered southern California its first public broadcast station. Many students have the unique opportunity to train at a functioning television station and at the community service radio station, also located on campus. Wide areas of southern California are served by these stations.

I commend the thousands of people who have worked for the past 60 years to make San Bernardino Valley College the great college that it is today. College President Dr. Arthur M. Jenson, the board of trustees, staff, and students at Valley College continue to make the college's philosophy of education more than just an empty promise. This philosophy states that, "The essential purposes of education are the preservation and enhancement of all that a society believes to be vital both to its survival and for the enrichment of the human spirit." For 60 years, San Bernardino Valley College has both enhanced its community and enriched the lives of its students.

NEW GI BILL IMPORTANT TO STRONG NATIONAL DEFENSE

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, the Reserve Officers Association of the United States is a congressional chartered association of Reserve, Regular, active and retired officers of the uniformed services, with a current membership of more than 120,000. The primary purpose of the Reserve Officers Association is to support a military policy for the United States which will provide for the Nation's security.

Recently the National Council of the Reserve Officers Association adopted a resolution in strong support of the new GI bill. This resolution, which expresses the sentiments and priorities of the ROA membership, urges the Congress to continue, extend, and fund the new GI bill. In addition, this resolution calls on the administration to abandon any initiatives to terminate this effective educational assistance program.

This resolution correctly recognizes the direct and important relationship between a strong national defense and the new GI bill which is encouraging more young men and women of ability to enlist in our armed services. I commend the ROA for its strong statement of support for the new GI bill and request that the text of this resolution be printed in the RECORD.

RESOLUTION OF THE RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES

Whereas, the FY85 Defense Authorization Act (PL98-525) provided for establishment of a new educational assistance test program effective through June 30, 1988, for active and Reserve components; and

Whereas, participation in the new educational assistance program has been exceptionally high in all of the active and Reserve services; and

Whereas, an Administration decision has been made to submit legislation to terminate the New GI Bill test program and return to the unpopular and ineffective Veterans Educational Assistance Program (VEAP); and

Whereas, returning to VEAP after completing the costly conversion to, and implementation of, the New GI Bill will cause widespread confusion and turbulance in the American public, damage morale in the services and recruiting programs; and

Whereas, deletion of the program will leave the Reserve components with no educational incentive program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Reserve Officers Association of the United States, chartered by the Congress, urge the Administration to abandon any initiatives to terminate the New GI Bill and urge the Congress to continue, extend and fund the effective educational assistance program.

BRAZILIANS DEMAND CLARIFICATION OF PRESIDENT'S SPEECH

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, last month the foreign minister of Brazil came to Washington along with the foreign ministers of seven other Latin American countries to plead with the administration not to provide additional funding for the Contras. He was ignored.

On February 27 Secretary Shultz told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the Nicaraguans were training Brazilian guerrillas. The Brazilian Embassy in Washington requested an explanation from the State Department, stating that there are no guerrillas in Brazil. The State Department was forced to apologize. Assistant Secretary of State Elliot Abrams wrote to the Brazilian Foreign Ministry that: "I regret that this matter has caused confusion." The Brazilians accepted this explanation and believed the case to be closed.

Then on Sunday March 16, the President in his speech made a similar accusation about Nicaraguan intervention in Brazil. The Brazilian Foreign Ministry was forced to take the unprecedented step of calling in the United States Charge d'Affaires to demand an explanation.

Mr. Speaker, there is simply no excuse for this. Not only has the administration consciously decided to mislead the American people, but it is also willing to create a major confrontation with a close ally in order to paint Nicaragua as a threat to the hemisphere and the world. This is yet another example of why the administration's Contra policy is bankrupt.

I am enclosing for the RECORD a Foreign Broadcast Information Service report from March 17 and an article by Richard House that appeared in today's Washington Post.

GOVERNMENT CRITICIZES GEORGE SHULTZ' REMARKS

BRASILIA, March 14.—Ruy Nogueira, Brazilian Foreign Ministry spokesman, has labeled the statement by U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz that Nicaragua is training guerrilla groups to reportedly operate in Brazil as "unfortunate, inappropriate, and irrelevant."

The spokesman reported that Elliott Abrams, U.S. assistant secretary of state for Inter-American Affairs, had sent a letter of apology to the Brazilian Foreign Ministry.

Shultz told the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee that Nicaragua is training guerrilla groups to operate in Brazil, Chile, Ecuador, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

Nogueira said: "There is no Nicaraguan intervention in Brazilian internal affairs."

Shultz made his statement to a committee on 27 February, as he was requesting Congress' authorization to provide $100 million for the Nicaraguan "contras."

The Brazilian Embassy in Washington has requested an explanation from the State Department of Shultz' statements, the Brazilian spokesman added.

Abrams has sent a letter to Brazilian Foreign Affairs Under Secretary Gilberto Velloso, saying that "I regret that this matter has caused confusion."

The U.S. official acknowledged in the letter that the existence of the groups to which Shultz referred does not imply that there are guerrillas in Brazil.

INCIDENT TERMED "'CLOSED"

The United States has admitted having improperly used Brazil's name. Therefore, the Foreign Ministry has regarded as closed the incident provoked by George Shultz' remarks that Brazilian guerrilla fighters were being trained in Nicaragua to see action in Brazil.

Itamaraty has received a letter noting that U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz meant that Brazilians were being trained in Nicaragua, but not to see action in Brazil.

BRAZIL DEMANDS U.S. CLARIFICATION

(By Richard House)

SALO PAULO, BRAZIL, MARCH 18.—Brazil has demanded U.S. clarification of President Reagan's statement during his televised address Sunday night that Nicaragua's Sandinista government is aiding radicals in this country.

Acting Foreign Minister Paulo Tarso Flecha de Lima yesterday summoned the U.S. Embassy charge d'affaires to request clarification of Reagan's remarks on the grounds that Brazil has had no internal security problems since at least 1979, when Nicaragua's Sandinista government came to power. Guerrilla groups were effectively wiped out a decade ago.

Reagan said that Brazil, Colombia, Ecuador, Chile, Argentina, Uruguay and the Dominican Republic were victims of Nicaragua's expansionist plans, because radical groups from these countries received training, safe haven, false documents and, occasionally, weapons from the Sandinistas.

A spokesman at the U.S. Embassy in Brasilia said that the Foreign Ministry requested clarification of what the president had meant. The spokesman said the text did not imply that all the countries had received the support from Nicaragua described by the president.

The incident follows a diplomatic exchange between Brazil and the State Department after Secretary of State George P. Shultz also mentioned Brazil as a victim of Nicaraguan terrorism in testimony to a foreign affairs committee on Capitol Hill on Feb. 28.

Elliot Abrams, assistant secretary of state for Latin American affairs, wrote his Brazilian counterpart an "explanatory letter" in which he acknowledged that the U.S. administration was aware that no guerrilla movements existed in Brazil.

Police in Rio de Janeiro, meanwhile, seized a secret cargo of arms aboard a Panamanian-registered freighter during the weekend. The freighter, Nobistor, arrived in Rio from Buenos Aires and carried machine guns, revolvers, rifles and grenades.

The crew of 10 Argentinians and eight U.S. citizens who told local police they were Vietnam War veterans working as mercenaries, said the cargo was picked up in Argentina. First reports said the cargo was destined for the African country of Ghana. Police denied other reports that the arms were destined for Central America, possibly Nicaragua.

REDUCING THE SOVIET UN DELEGATION

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan and his administration should be commended for ordering the Soviets to reduce their diplomatic staff at the United Nations from the present 275 to 170 by April 1988. The Soviet staff is currently more than twice as large as the next 2 largest—126 in the United States delegation and 116 in the Chinese delegation. Arkady Shevchenko, the highest ranking Soviet ever to defect, was serving as a U.N. Under Secretary at the time of his defection. He estimates that fully one-third of all Soviet diplomats are not diplomats at all, but spies. And many other staff members also engage in espionage when the need arises.

The Soviets have long maintained unjustifiably large diplomatic staffs in Western democracies to further clandestine Soviet foreign policy objectives. These objectives include such activities as gathering military and technological information, planting and disseminating disinformation in the media of the host country, and recruiting agents of influence from among the ranks of journalists, politicians, and the military.

To further assist in this problem, I have introduced H.R. 77 to require diplomatic parity between the United States and Communist countries. This bill would limit the number of Soviet diplomats in this country to the same number of diplomats that the United States is permitted to send to the Soviet Union. This bill would also apply to diplomatic immunities—any immunity that is not granted to our diplomats will not be granted to their diplomats here.

I believe that passage of this bill is in the best interests of our national security and our diplomatic representatives stationed in Communist countries, and I therefore hope that my colleagues will join me in cosponsoring it.

SUPPORT FOR SECONDARY MARKET TAX AMENDMENTS OF 1986

HON. GUY VANDER JAGT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to cosponsor with Congressman JAKE PICKLE the introduction of the Secondary Market Tax Amendments Act of 1986 or "SECTA" a bill intended to clarify and rationalize the tax rules governing the secondary mortgage market.

This legislation is expected to make the prospect of home ownership attainable for more Americans by making the secondary mortgage market more efficient in its operation, and thereby reducing mortgage interest rates. The legislation is intended to be roughly revenue neutral in the aggregate. The Treasury Department has estimated its impact as reducing revenues by approximately $100 million for the 1986–90 revenue estimating period. Practically, it may actually raise revenue as the current state of uncertainty and confusion in this area of the tax law is probably resulting in taxpayers generally taking positions most favorable to them, thus, creating whipsaw situations for the fisc. Elimination of this state of confusion is one of the primary goals of the legislation in a way which is administratively manageable for both taxpayers and the Internal Revenue Service.

PROBLEMS FACING THE SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET

Unfortunately, as a result of existing tax rules, unnecessary inefficiencies exist in the secondary mortgage market. In addition, there is confusion among investors and issuers as to the proper tax treatment of earnings generated from mortgage-related securities. These problems are not attributable to any explicit congressional or regulatory tax policy decisions. Rather, they are the result of the application of tax rules which inadvertently fail to take into account the unique characteristics of the secondary mortgage market, and, in particular, certain innovative instruments which have revolutionized the way we finance residential mortgages in this country.

THE IMPORTANCE OF MORTGAGE "SECURITIZATION"

Mr. Speaker, this quiet revolution is a result of what is called "securitization" or the process of turning pools of small, individual, home mortgage loans into marketable securities that can be sold to capital market investors. The percentage of home mortgage loans that are being "securitized" has grown from only 1 percent or 2 percent of new loan originations in 1970 to almost 40 percent in 1985. As a result, the growth of this securities market has been phenomenal. In 1970, there were less than $1 billion of outstanding publicly issued mortgage-backed securities. By the end of 1985, there were almost $400 billion of such securities outstanding. This now represents a market almost as large as the $472 billion of outstanding publicly issued corporate bonds. It is time the tax rules for this important market were reformed to make economic sense and tax policy sense.

HOW MORTGAGE-BACKED SECURITIES WORK

A mortgage-backed security works by insuring that the tax liability arising from income generated from mortgage payments is imposed on the investors in the security, rather than the financial institution acting as the issuer. Currently, this is generally accomplished by using a tax-exempt or passthrough investment vehicle, under the grantor trust rules. It also can be done, though much less efficiently, by creating a taxable entity that issues bonds backed by mortgage loans. The bond approach is generally referred to as a collateralized mortgage obligation or "CMO".

As I stated earlier, the tax rules applicable to these investment vehicles were developed without attention being given to the mortgage-backed securities market, and were written principally to deal with family trusts, and traditional corporate obligations. Thus, using these tax entities to securitize mortgages has led to problems, confusion, and ambiguities that were not foreseen when the rules were written. The purpose of this bill is to provide an understandable, rational set of rules to govern this important activity.

INNOVATIONS IN THE MARKET

In June 1983, CMO's began to be used as a vehicle for issuers to divide up a pool of long-term mortgages into multiple classes of short-term, medium-term, and long-term securities. Although there was still no active management as there is in a mutual fund, the multiple class approach provided long-term investors with protection against early redemption ("call protection") while also taking advantage of the fact that interest costs for short-term obligations are often lower than for long-term obligations. As a result, the multiple class security has provided a way to answer some of the shortcomings of the single-class pass-through vehicle with its restrictions on active management.

Over $30 billion in CMO's have been issued in only 2½ years, a remarkable success story for a new investment vehicle. Unfortunately, however, there are still a series of tax and accounting problems facing issuers and investors in these securities which prevent the CMO from being used to its greatest efficiency. In addition, there is a great deal of uncertainty about how the original issue discount rules of the Tax Code apply to these obligations. As a result, issuers and investors may be overtaxed, or undertaxed, in comparison to their true economic income.

MULTIPLE-CLASS PASS-THROUGHS

Theoretically, a much more efficient vehicle than a CMO could be used to structure multiple classes of ownership interests in a pool of mortgages. However, proposed Treasury regulations do not allow a pass-through vehicle to have multiple classes of ownership. If such a multiple class pass-through instrument were authorized, mortgage bankers, commercial banks, or other institutions could sell multiple classes of ownership interests in mortgage pools. If these institutions could "sell" mortgages to investors in a pass-through vehicle they would not have to carry debt on their balance sheets as required in the case of a CMO. In addition, because the pass-through would not be classified as debt for tax purposes, the issuer would not be required to retain any "equity" interest in the mortgages solely for tax purposes. An equity requirement creates additional legal, accounting, and capital costs for the issuer which interfere wtih efficiency and prevent interest costs from dropping as far as they otherwise could. Multiple class pass-throughs containing mortgages could also qualify as mortgage investments for purposes of the various tax provisions requiring thrift institutions or REIT's to invest in mortgages or real estate. Finally, if it were possible to authorize this vehicle by legislation, we could provide detailed tax rules to ensure that there was neither overtaxation nor undertaxation of investors in multiple-class mortgage related securities.

A BILL TO FACILITATE MORTGAGE SECURITIZATION

The bill I am cosponsoring today with Congressman PICKLE is based on the technical recommendation of a group of tax lawyers and financial experts who worked throughout 1985 to recommend solutions to tax-related problems associated with the secondary mortgage market, and to devise a more efficient, multiple-class mortgage security.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will address the major problems inherent in the current tax law through its four major provisions:

First, the legislation will clarify the precise method of computing original issue discount for CMO's in a manner that ensures that issuers and investors are properly taxed on their economic income.

Second, the legislation will permit CMO-like investment arrangements to be structured as ownership interests in a passive, multiple class, pass-through entity (referred to as a collateralized mortgage security or CMS) with strict rules designed to ensure that the amount, timing and character of income realized by the investors is not reduced, slowed down, or otherwise modified to result in adverse revenue effects.

Third, the legislation will provide that investments in the newly authorized CMS are treated as investments in mortgages under the Tax Code. This will enable thrift institutions and real estate investment trusts to invest in the new instrument and retain the tax advantages of investing in mortgages.

Fourth, the legislation will provide for expanded information reporting on mortgage related securities. This would improve taxpayer compliance and eliminate the potential for a whipsaw effect whereby issuers and investors take inconsistent tax reporting positions.

Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department has already indicated its desire for legislation in this area, and supports a legislative solution of the type set forth in SECTA. By addressing these significant tax and accounting problems, we will increase efficiency in the secondary mortgage market, reduce mortgage interest rates, and improve taxpayer compliance.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, my action in introducing this important legislation is intended as the first step in a process to deal with a very complicated area of the tax law. It is my hope that introduction of this legislation will facilitate close examination of the proposed legislation to insure that it achieves its intended purpose. To the extent changes are necessary to achieve that purpose, I will welcome them. I am hopeful that we can proceed expeditiously with this legislation. It seems that this is the year of tax reform. SECTA, in my view, proposes to revise a series of technical tax rules in an area where reform is long overdue, and where reform will provide demonstrable and palpable benefits for the ordinary citizen.

I believe we should take this unusual opportunity to pass legislation that is not only good tax policy, but good for the average American.

COUNTERING TERRORISM

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, yesterday as the House took the first of what I hope will be several steps to staunch the rising tide of international terrorism.

The Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Antiterrorism Act—H.R. 415—will help to protect American diplomats and enable them to carry out, without intimidation, our vital diplomatic business. The bill carries a heavy price tag; but careful investment in more secure embassies and improved counterterrorism capabilities is one we need to make.

So I rise in support of this timely legislation.

I want to make the additional point, however, that I don't support a fortress America approach to foreign policy. The roots of terrorism are as varied as they are complex. We must ready and steel ourselves to attack the roots of terrorism and not just respond to its symptoms. In that regard I want to stress that our foreign aid program must stress food for the hungry, education for the illiterate, and medicine for the sick. The extent to which America aligns itself with progresive change, instead of repressive dictatorships of either the left or right, will largely influence how successfully radical terrorists can gain an audience.

In that same regard, I would also like to call my colleagues' attention to a savvy article which sets forth some useful suggestions on how to craft a counterterrorism response.

Article by Robert H. Kupperman follows.

TERRORISM—WHAT SHOULD WE DO?

(By Robert H. Kupperman)

There is only one area of broad agreement about terrorism—the United States and its allies are against it, so much so we have "declared war" upon terrorists. Other than truisms about the need for international cooperation, no consensus has been established. In fact, few can agree upon a definition of terrorism. But, we do know some of its characteristics. It is political extortion that employs violence or the threat of violence; such extortions are usually targeted against large nations. The usual goal is to destabilize, to make a democratic government appear impotent and to amplify these effects through the electronic marvels of television. In sum, terrorism is theater.

The recent hijacking of TWA 847 was a tragic episode, but as important, it was a major media event. If we have learned anything from that incident at all, it is that coping with terrorism is not a simple, straightforward matter. It is a subject laden with paradoxes and conflicting needs for sovereign machismo and human compassion.

From the onset of the hijacking, the President of the United States faced a gut decision from which there was no escape. He had two basic choices—to guarantee the safety and well-being of every hostage or, on strategic grounds, to accept the plausible outcome of losing every hostage's life.

This was the basic strategic decision, those remaining were tactical rescue or diplomatic opportunities. The first path offered the Administration a variety of tactical options, including targets for retaliation and even preemptive opportunities to thwart future attacks. Possible targets included terrorist training camps in the Bekaa and economic targets, such as petroleum depots in Iran, as retaliation for this and past attacks.

Once the decision had been made to ensure the safety of every passenger, then retaliatory options virtually disappeared. Instead we entered into a "diplomatic minuet," the U.S. and Israel trying to keep a non-concessionary policy toward terrorism intact, and the United States having concurrently entered into unstated negotiations with Nabih Berri and Syria's President Assad. Berri and Assad, both of whom had been previously accused of sponsoring terrorism, had somehow become virginal. In the end, it was as though we had paid homage to Mafia godfathers for having returned the kidnap victims unharmed. By the time the incident had all but ended, when the hostages had given their press conference in Damascus, one had the feeling this was all occurring on a movie set, Assad having ordered the incident ended—"this is a wrap."

While patience is always required in any hostage siege, and no pure strategy is realistic, we run the risk of being condemned to once again relive Hegel's prophecy—"History teaches us that man learns nothing from history."

We are in the midst of an insidious and especially painful warfare that will not disappear miraculously. It is a form of unconventional conflict that denies an American president a chivalrous battlefield. Terrorism is clandestine, and it forces our national defense apparatus to cope well in an unseemly, murky environment. One thing is clear: if we do nothing, we will be attacked repeatedly.

America is the target of some 40 percent of international terrorist incidents. The often-stated reasons for this statistic are vague and speculative. Yet, most analysts believe that our mere size and presence are sufficient reasons to be targeted. Moreover, we are under assault by many terrorist groups. There is not just one conspiracy and one political motivation. In fact, most terrorist groups are small, numbering on the order of a hundred or fewer terrorists each, making our understanding of their intentions and organizational structures incomplete.

Through intelligence collection, police, and political means, many groups have been compromised. On the other hand, some are large separatist organizations, such as the I.R.A. and the Basques, who appear relatively immune to counterattack. Worse yet, some terrorist organizations are proxies of hostile governments, including Libya, Cuba, Syria and Iran.

The tactics needed to counter one group may not prove as effective for others. Probably, the tactics employed to destroy the early Baader-Meinhoff Gang would boomerang were they applied to Iran's Revolutionary Cells where tentacles are already in the United States.

The key to coping with terrorism must include an understanding of the values of the groups themselves as well as the goals of the sponsoring nations. While the Baader-Meinhoff Gang, and its successor (the R.A.F.), evaded the police by running from cellar to cellar, Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini might welcome a military attack by the United States. Not only would religious zeal and the resultant martyrdom flourish, so might the likelihood of Soviet presence in Iran increase.

Following the early Israeli model, Western governments have gradually hammered out partial counterterrorist policies—ranging from dicta to negotiate or not, to grant some concessions or none, to preempt or not, and to retaliate or not. In fact, we may well be spending too much time on forging policy when no fixed policy is desirable. Having a formal policy may injure us more than having none, because it would tie our hands. In today's environment, were we to make concessions and get caught at it, we would be in more trouble than never having had an announced policy.

What we need most are process, honed tools, tactical options, and practice. We need to game prototypical attacks, experiment with command and control regimes, and increase overall awareness of the peculiar problems of unconventional warfare. As a result, we need new technologies to increase our tactical agility, and we need to establish those command and control arrangements that lead directly to the White House itself.

We must also come to an increased accommodation with the media, understanding that too much media creates a circus-like atmosphere and may mess up back channel opportunities, but that excluding the media would make it likely that terrorists would kill more hostages.

Though we also need useful international agreements, including extradition treaties, we must be careful not to formalize matters so much that the "old boys' network" begins to falter. The very thing we need is confidence in each other, particularly at a time of urgent crisis when formal procedures often prove too cumbersome.

Worldwide, counterterrorism efforts have much in common—strategic and tactical intelligence collection and physical security. It would be best to have no predetermined response; especially if this policy of no predetermined response had previously been announced. Covert operations or military strikes must not be ruled out. Hegel's admonition notwithstanding, the lessons to be learned, if any, concern opportunism. Just as terrorists set us off balance, we need a flexible enough kit of diplomatic, economic and military tools to catch them off guard.

The debate regarding military assault has grown following every attack. We would be foolish to have a formal policy of either retaliation or non-retaliation. The important matter is to have the tools needed to appear ready and flexible at a time of stress and not perish as a standard-bearer of cavalier doctrine.

LIABILITY INSURANCE CRISIS: LOCAL GOVERNMENT IS A "VICTIM"

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, March 13, I introduced the "Local Government Liability Relief Act of 1985" (H.R. 4406). This legislation attempts to respond to the very serious problem confronting units of local government (cities, counties, townships, villages, school and park districts) throughout the Nation. That is, they are suffering from the tremendous rise in the cost of liability insurance coverage and the increasing difficulty in obtaining such coverage in a number of States. This situation has been prompted, in part, by the recent rash of lawsuits and the size of damage awards against localities and their public officials.

H.R. 4406 addresses this situation by proposing major reforms in the civil justice system (tort liability) when suits are brought against local governments or local officials (when acting in their official capacity). These reforms would be applicable to suits against localities in both Federal and State courts. First, punitive damage awards against localities would be limited to two times the amount of actual damages. Second, attorney's fees would be limited to 25 percent of any judgment (or settlement) where a unit of local government is the defendant.

Third, and perhaps most important, the liability standard in those lawsuits would become comparative negligence rather than the more typical standard of joint and several liability. Currently, joint and several liability leaves a local government potentially liable for the entire scope of the damages, even though they may be only partially responsible for the injury in question. Comparative negligence means that there could not be a recovery in excess of the locality's actual responsibility for the harm. This change would protect local governments and local taxpayers against suits motivated by a search for a convenient "deep pocket" recovery.

The erosion of the sovereign immunity defense over the last 20 years has placed local governments in a highly vulnerable situation. Localities have had to eliminate or reduce services because insurance coverage has either been greatly reduced or is no longer available at all. Local governments, whether large or small, confront major obstacles in purchasing adequate liability insurance coverage—exorbitant rates, annual premium increases exceeding several hundred percent, reduced levels of coverage, higher deductibles, and an ever-shrinking pool of insurance carriers willing to underwrite such coverage. Some cities have either been forced or opted to go without any insurance protection at all!

In late 1985, the United States Conference of Mayors released a survey they conducted on this problem in 40 cities throughout the Nation. Only 5 of the 40 cities surveyed responded by saying their rates had not increased in the past 2 years. One-half (20) of the cities responded that rate increases in excess of 100 percent had occurred in that time frame, and 16 of those 20 received rate increase quotes above 200 percent. Furthermore, the Conference of Mayors survey documents that the list of insurance carriers willing to underwrite municipal liability is dwindling. In several instances, cities reported that when bids were solicited for coverage—not a single bid was received.

In my own State of Illinois, Knox, Livingston and Madison counties have had desperate problems securing needed coverage. Five Chicago suburbs and the city of Decatur have had similar experiences. Last week, the Will County Forest Preserve District closed 23 parks indefinitely, after its liability insurance was canceled. Three cities—Rockford, Naperville and Arlington Heights—have opted for self-insurance, as has Springfield's pubic transit system. But self-insurance is workable only if large damage awards do not occur.

The time has come for Congress to send a strong message to the State legislatures that we support major reforms in the negligence and tort-law system. If you want to join with me in this effort and co-sponsor H.R. 4406, please call Alan Coffey of Judiciary minority staff on extension 56906.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, Edward J. Brown, Jr., acclaimed artist and resident of Prince George's County, displayed many of his works in the Rayburn Building on Capitol Hill on Friday, February 28, Mr. Brown is a well-respected portrait and graphic artist, as well as a cartoonist, musician, and composer. Mr. Brown, painting since he was a teenager, attended Eastern A&N in Omaha, NE. He tries to add to his collection each year.

The art display included portraits of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Dr. Charles Drew, Booker T. Washington, Soujourner Truth, William E.B. Dubois, Frederick Douglass, Mary McLeod Methune, W.C. Handy, Benjamin Banneker, Dr. Carter G. Woodson, Blanche K. Bruce, Patricia R. Harris, and Eleanor Roosevelt. He presented the portrait he painted of Congressman PARREN MITCHELL to the Congressman personally.

Mr. Brown's exhibit, in conjunction with the Epsilon Delta Chapter of Iota Phi Lambda Sorority, was in commemoration of Black History Month. Iota Phi Lambda Sorority, Inc. is a Prince George's County business and professional sorority of women who are united in sisterhood for the purpose of encouraging the elevation of their self-concept as it relates to the role of women in our highly complex, competitive business and professional world. To this end, the women of Iota Phi Lambda Sorority promote interest among high school and college women in the broad field of business education through scholarships, encourage women to pursue excellence in business endeavors and, to support black businesses, encourage youths and adults to pursue higher education and professional attainment, and foster activities to assist today's women to cope with new technological and societal changes by aiding them in meeting their basic human needs. The sorority's most recent national project emphasized remediation and tutoring as well as career exploration for youths in order to prepare them for the future.

NO CHECKS OR BALANCES TO CONTRA POLICY

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, our policy of overt and covert destabilization of the Nicaraguan Government has been fraught with misrepresentations, distortions, and illegality. The people of Nicaragua have borne the consequences of this war. But the policy helps to corrupt our own political system, one which relies on checks and balances between the Congress and the Executive, and which presupposes honesty in the practice of our foreign policy.

I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues two articles which have appeared in the past week in the Los Angeles Times, which deal with both the foreign and domestic effects of our policy toward Nicaragua.

The articles follow:

NO CHECKS OR BALANCES TO CONTRA POLICY

(By Terry Lynn Karl and Kenneth E. Sharpe)

The White House campaign to support the Nicaraguan contras not only promotes dubious policy; it also corrupts the constitutional rules for the making of foreign policy.

After five years of backing by the United States, there is no evidence that the contras are an effective foreign-policy tool. An inept force that is unable to dislodge the Sandinistas, the contras have systematically abused human rights and increased regional tensions. Continued military aid, despite the explicit opposition of eight major Latin countries, blocks a diplomatic solution to the conflict in Central America. Administration policy assures that even veteran negotiator Philip Habib can do little more than serve as a cosmetic device that is aimed at squeezing contra money from Congress.

Just as important as the policy abroad is the largely unnoticed constitutional struggle at home. The Administration's McCarthyite rhetoric—colored by Secretary of State George P. Shultz's casting of the coming congressional vote as a choice between "good guys" and "bad guys," and the President's dire warnings of a Central America that is "covered in a sea of red"—is merely the latest salvo in a presidential offensive against Congress' budget and war-making powers.

If Congress acquiesces to the President's request for $100 million in aid to the contras, it will reward a mode of policy formulation based on illegal acts and a circumvention of congressional checks and balances, thereby ensuring that these tactics will be used in the future.

The Administration's flagrant violation of the law in its Central America policy can be amply documented. The War Powers Act of 1973 (which was passed in part in response to the illegal bombing of Cambodia) stipulates that Congress must be fully informed within 48 hours when U.S. forces are introduced into potentially hostile areas. Yet by early 1985 the American military had flown reconnaissance missions over Nicaraguan air space and Salvadoran battlefields, participated in naval-interdiction activities in the Gulf of Fonseca, was stationed in brigade headquarters in zones of conflict in El Salvador, and had come under fire in at least eight separate incidents. Congress was never informed about any of these actions.

The Boland Amendment, adopted in December, 1982, prohibited the use of funds "for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Nicaragua." For 2½ years, until the amendment lapsed, the Administration continued to finance the contra army while its leaders openly declared their intent to overthrow the Sandinistas.

The 1980 Intelligence Oversight Act obligates the Central Intelligence Agency to provide full and current reports of its activities to Congress. But the CIA failed to inform the intelligence-oversight committees of the mining of Nicaragua's harbors until a full six weeks after the initial detonation—even though such activities constitute an international act of war.

In a 1981 executive order President Reagan prohibited the involvement of any U.S. agency in assassinations. However, the order was violated by the CIA's operations manual for Nicaraguan contras, which gave instructions "to neutralize carefully selected and planned targets, such as court judges, . . . police and state security officials."

In addition to violating the law the Administration consistently circumvented congressional spending restrictions. It built bases in Honduras, using funds that were earmarked for military maneuvers. The CIA charged expenses, such as the mining of Nicaragua's harbors, to its other accounts. An airfield for the contras also was built illegally in Honduras, using funds earmarked for Defense Department military exercises.

The Pentagon also donated aircraft to transport supplies to contra bases and transferred ships, planes and guns to the CIA for use in Nicaragua with little or no charge. When Congress cut aid to the contras in late 1984, the White House then permitted a member of the National Security Council to help organize private funding for the rebels.

Vietnam and Watergate brought home the dangers of an imperial presidency—a Chief Executive who evades the authority of Congress and the courts, views himself above the law in foreign-policy matters, and uses secrecy and distortion to deceive other branches of government and the public in order to accomplish his policy objectives. Those difficult episodes in our history resulted in legislation such as the War Powers Act of 1973, to protect the democratic process from abuses of power.

Administration policy toward Nicaragua and the rest of Central America threatens to undo democratic safeguards at home by undermining these careful mechanisms of accountability. After systematically excluding Congress from the takeoff of an illegal and misguided contra policy, it now wants to strong-arm Congress into co-piloting its mission to disaster.

Congress' response should be clear and unequivocal. Both the contra policy and the imperial presidency are unacceptable. Its lawmakers should not support law breakers.

[From the Los Angeles Times, Mar. 17, 1986]

WHERE IS AID TO CONTRAS REALLY GOING?

(By Saul Landau and Joy Hackel)

Policy-makers preparing to vote on aid to the contras in Nicaragua would do well to keep in mind the plunder of the Philippines by Ferdinand E. Marcos. Government auditors testifying before Congress earlier this month revealed that at least $7.1 million channeled last year to the contras could not be accounted for. The announcement raised a few eyebrows in Congress, and several members have called for an examination of the nuts and bolts of the Administration's Nicaraguan policy: Who gets the money appropriated, and what is done with it?

According to the congressional testimony of General Accounting Office director Frank Conhan, State Department audit controls "cannot verify actual delivery or receipt of items . . . and are unable to observe the end use of items to ensure that they were not diverted, bartered or exchanged."

This pronouncement shouldn't take many by surprise. Since it began in 1981, the U.S. contra aid program has fostered lies, fraud and corruption. CIA Director William J. Casey first told Congress that the President needed $19 million to "interdict" arms flowing from the Sandinistas to the Salvadoran rebels. More than two years passed, and more millions were spent on "interdicting," but U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador Deane Hinton told Congress that "nary a pistola" had been intercepted. What then was the money spent for?

According to author Christopher Dickey in his new book, "With the Contras," the early funding was never intended for stopping an arms flow, which was minimal in 1981. Rather, it was intended for the CIA to form the contras out of a gang of former Nicaragua National Guardsmen loyal to ousted dictator Anastasio Somoza. These guardsmen had earned a reputation for brutality. In fact, these men who formed the contras, according to Dickey, had committed gross human-rights violations that the CIA knew about.

Dickey claims that the lion's share of the aid went to a handful of former Nicaragua National Guard officers, such as Capt. Ricardo ("El Chino") Lau, a man with a reputation for murder and torture. Lau did not intercept the Sandinistas, Dickey says, or the alleged arms carriers. In 1985 a former director of intelligence in El Salvador claimed that Lau received $120,000 to help arrange the assassination of El Salvador's Archbishop Oscar Romero, though this so far has not been proved. And Lau is only one of more than 40 former Somoza guardsmen in the contra command.

Another misuse of funds was reported by former contra leader Edgar Chammorro, who disclosed that U.S. funds were actually spent to lobby members of Congress.

Last year Congress allotted $27 million to the contra cause. This figure also bears some scrutiny. It takes $1 per day to sustain a fighter, according to the Administration. This sum, multiplied by 18,000 contras, accounts for only $6.5 million. Where's the rest? Granted, the rebel army has expenses other than attending to its soldiers, but only if corruption were rampant would the contras themselves be screaming that they don't have basic materials—boots, rice and beans. Meanwhile, according to a report in the New York Times, each of the seven directors of the largest U.S.-backed contra group, the Nicaraguan Democratic Force (FDN), receives a yearly salary of $84,000 from the United States, tax-free.

The contras are of course, not the only example of where U.S. funds intended for covert actions are converted into personal profit. Serious abuses were reported in Pakistan, where the heroin and arms trade have followed CIA money—as they did during the Vietnam War in the Golden Triangle (a heavy drug-trafficking area, where the borders of Thailand, Laos and Burma meet.)

The lesson here is that in a covert climate, fraud and corruption flourish.

As the Administration's new romance with covert operations and "low-intensity warfare" spawns fresh scandals, we approach the 10th anniversary of the Church Committee, which exposed earlier CIA misdeeds—assassination attempts and coups—in a variety of Latin American locales. Things have not changed. A former Salvadoran army officer claims that he worked for the CIA and served as a translator for a U.S. official who advised the Salvadoran military on torture techniques and assassinations.

When lies and cover-ups are necessary to pursue a policy in order to circumvent Congress and the law, corruption follows as day follows night.

The President's request for $100 million more to aid contra forces is as good as throwing money down the drain.

The Reagan policy toward Nicaragua is wrong, and the Administration's fiscal misdeeds throughout the entire contra program may be the most visible weak link in the rotten chain. If Congress gives one good yank, we might all see what comes apart.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO REAR ADM. BENJAMIN F. MONTOYA

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Rear Adm. Benjamin F. Montoya of the Civil Engineer Corps of the U.S. Navy who will be honored at a dinner by the Hispanic Business Association—Greater Long Beach Chapter on March 29, 1986.

Admiral Montoya was born in Indio, CA. He attended the U.S. Naval Academy and graduated in 1958. He also attended Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, where he received a bachelor's degree in civil engineering; Georgia Tech, where he received a master of science degree in sanitary engineering; and Georgetown University Law Center where he received a law degree. He was admitted to the District of Columbia bar in 1981.

In addition to his fine educational background, Admiral Montoya has had an illustrious 27-year career in the Navy. Admiral Montoya has served the Navy in Port Hueneme, CA, San Juan, PR, Long Beach Naval Shipyard, and while with the Seabees he deployed twice to Vietnam. The admiral also served as commanding officer of the U.S. Navy Public Works Center in San Diego and Director of Environmental Protection Division on the staff of the Chief of Naval Operations, before being promoted to his present position as Commander of the Western Division, Naval Facilities Engineering Command. Under his command is the largest of the Navy's Facilities Engineering Divisions, which covers nine States and is headquartered in San Bruno, CA.

In recognition of his excellent work in the Navy, Admiral Montoya has received several decorations for his service. He has been awarded the Legion of Merit, the Meritorious Service Medal, the Bronze Star with Combat V, the Navy Commendation Medal, and the Navy Achievement Medal, among other decorations. Admiral Montoya will be promoted to a position on the Navy Planning Board in June of this year.

My wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating Rear Adm. Montoya on the occasion of his being honored by the Hispanic Business Association—Greater Long Beach Chapter, and in wishing Benjamin Montoya, his wife Virginia, and his seven children, Benjamin, Jr., David, Michael, Chris, Patrick, Theresa, and Natasha, continued success, and all the best in the years ahead.

H.R. 3521, SOURCE LICENSING BILL

HON. WILLIAM HILL BONER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, our Nation has always applauded individual effort and creativity. However, a threat to that principle is looming on the legislative horizon. That bill is H.R. 3521, the so-called Source Licensing bill.

This legislation would cost writers and their publishers tens of millions of dollars of their income that is distributed annually. It would hamper the individual effort and creativity they use to bring us the music we are all so familiar with. It would take that money and hand it over to the already cash-rich television industry.

The net results of the passage of H.R. 3521 would be fewer creators of music—more financial strain on the show producers—and richer owners of television stations. The purpose of the copyright law—to foster and reward creativity—would be bypassed.

Today, I join the songwriters and composers from Music City USA, Nashville, TN in opposing this bill.

I would also like to insert in the RECORD, a commentary by Hal David, the president of ASCAP, that was published in the December 28, 1985 issue of Billboard Magazine.

NICARAGUA—A TIME FOR ACTION

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, an excellent article on Nicaragua has come to my attention which I am pleased to bring to my colleagues' attention. It was written by Mr. Ronald K. Sable, Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs.

NICARAGUA: A TIME FOR ACTION

Somewhere in northern Nicaragua, members of the Democratic resistance to the Communist regime of Daniel Ortega are gathering support for the resistance and discussing the debate taking place in America over military aid to the resistance. They wonder how the issue could be so difficult. Why would Americans consider any option but aid to the resistance?

Perhaps Americans oppose aid to the resistance because they think many of them are Somozistas.

Though some would argue that the resistance is primarily Somozistas, surely they would know that less than 3 percent of the armed opposition had any ties to Somoza—a number statistically irrelevant. Even within the FDN leadership, former National Guard members number less that 30 percent. In the case of the United Nicaraguan Opposition (UNO), each of the leaders have strong democratic credentials. Adolfo Calero was jailed by Somoza. Arturo Cruz and Alfonso Robelo, who were members of the ruling junta after Somoza's fall, joined the opposition when Sandinista policy abandoned the principles espoused at its inception.

Maybe people are looking at it the wrong way. The Sandinistas have a large number of former National Guard leaders along with Soviet and Cuban leaders, backed up by Libyan, Iranian and PLO funding.

Perhaps they think that military aid should not be given to the democratic resistance until the diplomatic process has run its course.

Maybe they are unaware of intense U.S. diplomatic initiatives over the last several months. The United States offer of a church-mediated dialogue among the people of Nicaragua, now nearly a year old, remains unanswered by Managua. The Sandinistas have disrupted Contadora meetings (June 1985) rejected draft Contadora agreements (Sept. 1985) much like ones they previously agreed to accept, and asked for a suspension of Contadora negotiations (Dec. 1985). Most recently (Feb. 1985), Nicaragua refused to address key areas of disagreement of the treaty text.

Is that the record of a group willing to negotiate, willing to bring a peaceful end to the situation in Nicaragua? Somehow I doubt it. Setting aside Mr. Ortega's dismal negotiating record, has the period of negotiating improved the situation? It certainly has, but not for the democratic resistance. In fact, during the last year, while military aid to the resistance has been denied, the Soviet Union has increased aid to Nicaragua tenfold, supplying more aid in the first 2 months of this year than in the entire year of 1985. Further, Mr. Ortega has suspended major civil liberties. He has closed Radio Catolica, closed the church newspaper, began interfering with religious masses and assisted the M-19 massacre in the Colombian Palace of Justice. In his latest move, Ortega has been drafting members of the seminary.

During the same period Sandinista military forces, already larger than all their neighbors combined, have grown to 60,000 regular troops, equipped with Soviet T-55 and T-72 tanks and Hind armed helicopters, hardly the type of activity expected by someone truly interested in a peaceful settlement.

Perhaps they don't understand the series of commitments made to the OAS in 1979 by the Sandinistas, commitments to an open and Democratic society.

In the 6 years since the 1979 declaration, not one single commitment has been fulfilled. The people of Nicaragua deserve better.

Perhaps they don't understand why Nicaragua's neighbors won't speak out in favor of aid to the resistance.

Put yourself in the position of those neighbors. Costa Rica, for example, a country without a military force of its own, faces 60,000 troops with modern weapons just on the other side of its border. Under the same circumstances, what would you say publicly?

Perhaps, it is the natural tendency to delay facing up to a problem.

That approach nearly caused the downfall of President Duarte in El Salvador. Fortunately, the right decisions were made there, support was provided, and real progress is being made. President Duarte recently offered to sit down with the Sandinista-supported rebels in his country if Ortega will do the same with the Democratic resistance in Nicaragua. Ortega, however, continues to reject that offer or any other reasonable approach.

In Nicaragua however, putting off real support for the democratic resistance, puts off support for democracy. Dealing with the Nicaraguan question requires tough choices and a willingness to deal with the source of the problem instead of the symptoms. As difficult as that choice may be for some, it is the right thing to do because it deals with the problem at its roots, before the cancer spreads further and reverses the democratic trend in Central America.

If you ignore the Sandinista military buildup (beyond any conceivable defensive need), ignore the repression and restrictions of press and religion, ignore subversion of neighboring countries, ignore the support of terrorism, most recently evidenced in the Hall of Justice in Colombia, when do you stop ignoring what the Sandinistas are doing? When the Soviets/Cubans have a solid foothold in Central America? When they take over Costa Rica and Honduras? When they get to Mexico? No, if America is smart, the time to stop the Sandinistas, to offer real support to the democratic resistance is now. It is time to step up to that responsibility in Nicaragua as you have in Afghanistan, as we have in El Salvador. To now abandon those who speak for freedom of the people is to abandon the ideals of your forefathers—the immigrants and revolutionaries who came before you. Both deserve better.

IT'S TIME TO LIFT THE JAPANESE AUTO QUOTAS

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my colleagues' attention to the fact that Japan has decided to extend its import quotas on autos for a sixth straight year. The Reagan administration first negotiated a "voluntary restraint agreement" [VRA] with the Japanese Government in 1981. It did so in the face of strong congressional pressure for very strict quotas and domestic content legislation. In this VRA, the Japanese agreed to limit exports of automobiles to the United States to 1.68 million units for each of 3 years. A fourth-year extension was implemented at a level of 1.85 million units.

The VRA has had a costly impact on consumers. There is no question that by creating an artificial scarcity of Japanese imports, the VRA's have increased the prices of both imported and domestic cars. The International Trade Commission reported in 1985 that due to the VRA's, U.S. consumers spent a combined total of $15.7 billion in additional costs in the 4 years ended in 1984. U.S. automakers posted record profits in 1983 and 1984, while selling fewer cars than in the record sales year of 1977. This means that the record profits were due to the higher prices charged as a result of import restrictions.

The present VRA extension has come at a time when the rise in the value of the yen has substantially reduced the price advantage that the Japanese imports have enjoyed. These quotas now serve only to unnaturally prop up the profits of the American auto companies. While doing so, they distort competition and impose added costs on consumers. They will also encourage Japanese expansion into the large car market, putting more pressure on United States companies. Their only positive impact is to lessen the protectionist fever in Congress.

The time for the quotas to be lifted is now. But it is crucial that this move not lead to the enactment of protectionist legislation by Congress. Quotas and protectionist measures have historically proven unsuccessful and economically damaging. Fair trade means free trade. Free trade means open markets and fair trading practices and procedures This is the approach needed to encourage American companies to improve their competitiveness, which will benefit the consumer and the economy.

I am heartened that the Washington Post, on February 17, 1986, saw fit to opine against the Japanese move and enumerate the harm served American consumers as a result. I commend the article to your attention and include it here.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 17, 1986]

THE AUTO QUOTAS

The three major American automobile companies earned $8.1 billion last year. They owe nearly all of it to the "voluntary restraints"—that is, mandatory import quotas—that the Japanese government has now decided to extend through a sixth year. With these import quotas in effect, the prices of American-made cars averaged about $1,000 higher than they otherwise would have. Since the three companies sold 7.8 million cars last year, the figures suggest that in the absence of quotas they would have been running right at the edge of profitability.

The White House has received the Japanese government's announcement in studied silence. While the administration obviously welcomes the extention of the quotas, in deference to its free market principles it prefers not to discuss the subject publicly. It meets all inquiries with slightly defensive observations that trade must be fair as well as free.

But the rise of the yen has already eliminated the one great unfair advantage that the Japanese imports enjoyed. Last summer an undervalued currency gave a subsidy worth perhaps $2,700 to each $10,000 car imported from Japan. Now, with the yen at its present value, that subsidy has disappeared.

There is one powerful reason to keep the quotas in effect another year: they are very helpful to the Reagan administration in its struggle to dissuade Congress from enacting violently protectionist legislation. There was a huge congressional outcry last year when the Japanese raised the quota from 1.85 million cars a year to the present 2.3 million—one out of every five cars sold in this country.

But the quotas are going to have lasting effects, by no means all of them beneficial to the American automobile manufacturers. Quotas put pressure on the Japanese companies to move upward in the American market toward larger and more expensive models. That upward movement is going to be accelerated by the arrival of small Korean cars built to undercut the Japanese. The effect is to increase foreign competition in the most profitable parts of the American market. While the quotas speed up this process, it won't be reversed when the quotas are eventually lifted.

And when do you suppose the quotas will be lifted? They are immensely costly to people buying cars. They distort competition, and put efficient Japanese manufacturers under restrictions that less efficient manufacturers in, for example, Germany, France and Britain do not have to cope with. The American companies have now had the two most profitable years in their history, and the yen is no longer undervalued. If not now, when will the time be right to drop the quotas?

TRIBUTE TO DAN LEONARD

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the people of the United States and Florida and I and the members of my Washington and district offices lost a dear friend when Lt. Col. Dan Leonard, director of law enforcement operations for the Broward County sheriff's office, died suddenly at the age of 62.

Dan Leonard was a 37-year veteran of law enforcement, having started his career with the New York City Police Department. While a member of New York's finest, he served as the partner of our distinguished colleague MARIO BIAGGI. By the time Dan retired from that job, he commanded all narcotics enforcement in Manhattan.

Many of my colleagues will remember Dan from his work on the staff of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control and his job as the Deputy Director of the President's Office of Drug Abuse Policy. He brought to these jobs the same dedication and abhorrence of drug abuse that he showed in New York.

I came to know Dan well because his wife Arlene served as my Washington office manager and personal secretary for 2 years. Dan was a passionate and compassionate human being who enjoyed life to the fullest. He always interjected a wisecrack with a kind word or a smattering of advice. No matter how gloomy life may have seemed. Dan managed to find that silver lining.

Dan Leonard was a street cop with street smarts. While he may not have liked sitting behind a desk, he served the people of Broward County well during his all too short tenure with the Broward sheriff's office.

Sheila and I extend, on behalf of ourselves and my entire family and staff, our deepest sympathy to his widow Arlene and to his family. Mere words are insufficient to express the sorrow that our hearts feel the loss.

A TRIBUTE TO THE CREW OF THE SPACE SHUTTLE

HON. BARBARA F. VUCANOVICH

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I have received a letter from a fellow Nevadan concerning the tragic loss of the crew of the space shuttle Challenger.

The letter was written by an Elko County teacher, married to another teacher, whose daughter has always dreamed of becoming an astronaut. Their daughter, who is now suffering from rheumatoid arthritis, has not abandoned her dream, and now aspires to become a mission specialist in a vital and developing space program, and she hopes to grow up and be a part of this special team.

The teacher, while urging me not to destroy the hopes of so many young people by abandoning support for the space shuttle, enclosed two of her daughter's poems. The poems were written right after the tragic accident, and I found them very moving. I would like to share the thoughts on this tragedy as seen through the eyes of Tami Mayer, a bright and determined 12-year-old.

The poems follow:

A TRIBUTE TO THE SEVEN CREW MEMBERS OF THE SPACE SHUTTLE "CHALLENGER"

(By Tami Mayer)

A dream, high hopes,
A roar, dragon's fire, a puff of smoke,
A pilot, an engineer, a scientist, all-in-all,
Six great minds standing alone,
One brilliant mind to teach the history of us all,
The flight of birds on fuel powered wings,
A flame, a strike, lightning's fire,
A blast, a boom, a ball of fire, a story of death.
A loss, great sorrow, a nation's tear,
Seven lives, a hope, a brilliance lost,
But a dream lives on for others to follow.
The trail of smoke remains as a path to find,
To touch a face, a face of God,
To reach a goal in man's great future,
This they tried and for this they died.
But neither their spirit,
Nor their determination is lost,
The dream lives on to reach . . .
The stars.

A SECOND TRIBUTE TO THE CREW OF THE SPACE SHUTTLE "CHALLENGER"

(by Tami Mayer)

Laughing at the flame of death,
The courage and brilliance they had,
Making the hearts of millions sad.
They need not grave,
They need no tomb,
They are laid to rest in a bright red plume.
Through a giant sky they flew,
Sailing over the ocean blue.
No one knows just where they'll land,
For their wings are washed up,
On golden sand.
We all knew where they meant to go,
But where they are, no one knows.
No one knew just how they went,
But feathered wings are the best.
They died for us,
We'll try again
They wouldn't want
Our frontier to end.
They didn't quit,
Neither will we,
Though today we kneel and we grieve.

GALLIPOLIS LOCKS: RIVER COMMERCE COMES TO A HALT—AGAIN

HON. CLARENCE E. MILLER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, time and again, I have highlighted the importance of the Gallipolis Locks and Dam project. Time and again, I have underscored the fact that the aging Gallipolis complex—which was opened to traffic 1937—is the most hazardous navigational facility from Pittsburgh to Cincinnati. Time and again, the supporters of a new Gallipolis locking chamber have asked Congress to press on with critical legislation essential to the construction of a new 1,200-foot compound.

The House has approved a bill authorizing Gallipolis, but the measure has not yet cleared the Senate. A comprehensive, omnibus water development bill has not been enacted into law, in fact, since 1970. Instead, water project problems have been addressed by bits and pieces and with patchwork legislative procedures that is a far cry from the appropriate legislative process for dealing with something as important as the future of inland navigational commerce.

Through it all, Gallipolis has become the most dangerous facility on the Ohio River and, perhaps, the most difficult to negotiate on any river throughout the Midwest. It is the only locking complex from the Pennsylvania border to the Gulf of Mexico with a 600-foot main chamber. Accidents and near misses at Gallipolis have become almost legendary.

Gallipolis experienced another accident last night. The Army Corps of Engineers office in Huntington just informed me today that the complex closed—completely closed to all river traffic—due to an accident involving a 10-barge tow last evening. Repairs will take 3 days and it is estimated by the corps that the backup of tows waiting to lock through Gallipolis could total 45 tows and as many as 400 barges.

Let me stress again: nothing is moving through Gallipolis today: tows are dead in the water or tied up along shore at a projected delay cost rate of $300 per tow daily. Gallipolis is an essential passage point for the movement of coal, petroleum, agricultural products, coke, and chemicals to and from key industrial plants lining the river from the gulf to Pittsburgh. It is a certainty that the impact of this latest mishap on the Ohio River highway at Gallipolis will be felt economically throughout the Midwest. The Ohio Valley has been, again, tied into knots. The only good news to surface from the accident is that no one was killed or injured.

What is disturbing about this incident is that it has happened before at Gallipolis and it will, more than likely, happen again. The present situation only emphasizes the fact that the decrepit conditions at the old complex will only worsen. The corps does the best it can with a complex that is already in its ninth life. As a body, Congress should place the proper emphasis on Gallipolis and get an omnibus bill which will build a new chamber at Gallipolis on the President's desk without further delay. Accidents on the river should be prevented, not expected, as they presently are at Gallipolis.

THE ADMINISTRATION AND THE TRUTH

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, the President in his speech last Sunday presented an ominous picture of what he describes as the threat that Nicaragua poses to United States interests and world stability. Not only were there a number of factual errors in the speech that some journalists have already pointed out, but this administration's description of the evils of Sandinista rule is in disproportion to the stated policy of providing $100 million in aid to the Contras.

James Reston had something to say about this apparent disproportion in the Washington Post of March 3, 1986. He said:

It's interesting what the White House has tried to do about Nicaragua. It has stated the menace in such harsh terms that its proposal for another $100 million seems almost modest. If there is a threat to the security of the United States, as the President and the Secretaries of State and Defense say, why a mere $100 million? Why not a decision to intervene with our own troops to remove the threat they say is posed by the Sandinista governments?

Even George Will agreed in a column that appeared in the Washington Post last Sunday. In describing the President's Contra campaign Mr. Will said:

He has painted the picture in the strongest primary colors, but his request is a pale pastel: just $100 million, only $70 million of it for military aid. A request five times larger might be more successful because it would be more realistically related to the scale of the task and the president's assessment of the stakes.

Mr. Will is clearly expressing what the administration's real intentions are. It might be $100 million today, but it will be $200 or $300 million next year.

But as James Reston pointed out in his article:

Congress has its doubts, and so does the press. They have been told so many lies about the Nicaraguan problem by the administration that they are no longer willing to be overwhelmed by this latest propaganda campaign out of the White House.

I urge my colleagues to carefully analyze the statements coming from the administration to determine what is true and what is not.

I am submitting for the record the James Reston article from March 5, and a March 18 article by Joanne Omang on factual errors in the President's speech.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 5, 1986]

THE LIE DETECTORS

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON.—We need some lie detectors around here. The most prominent advertising agency in Washington these days is the firm of Reagan, Weinberger, Shultz and Speakes, situated at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.

These guys, with the aid of Pat Buchanan inside and Mike Deaver outside, think they can sell refrigerators to the Eskimos, but sometimes they go too far.

Having sold "Star Wars" and dumped their old buddies in Haiti and the Philippines, they are now engaged in a major campaign to convince Congress and the American people that Nicaragua is a menace to the United States, and that unless they get $100 million for the "freedom fighters" on the border, Mikhail Gorbachev in Moscow and Fidel Castro in Havana will threaten the security and democracy of the Western Hemisphere.

It's the boldest advertising campaign since the Ford Motor Company tried to sell the Edsel.

Suddenly, the Administration has aimed all its big guns on Nicaragua—and let's agree, Nicaragua is a problem.

The President proclaimed that failure by the Congress to vote that $100 million for the Nicaraguan rebels or "freedom fighters" would be a "strategic disaster" that could "well deliver Nicaragua permanently to the Communist bloc."

He gathered a few commentators into the theater of the White House the other day to emphasize the point, along with Secretary of Defense Weinberger and Secretary of State Shultz, who not only supported the President but indicated that he was minimizing the problem.

Then Mr. Shultz and other members of the Administration went on to veterans' groups and other so-called press conferences to pick up the theme of the coming "disaster" if they didn't get that $100 million.

At first they suggested that it might be un-American to oppose such an investment in Nicaragua, but when challenged on this point, they agreed that maybe it was all right, but wrong-minded to disagree.

Nevertheless, the President has charged so hard on this $100 million for Nicaragua, and overstated his case so obviously, that he has challenged the judgment of Congress and vilified the press—some of whose members, when trying to question him, were denounced as "sons of bitches."

Well, as the President is always saying with an amiable nod of his head, we have to be careful. It's a hard call what to do about Nicaragua. The Secretary of State has said that the Russians have put about half a billion in there in the last five years, and he testifies that the Cubans have been engaged in military operations on gunships from the Soviet Union against the opponents of the Nicaraguan Government, and therefore that Congress must act and act quickly to vote that $100 million.

But the Administration's pressure on Congress and on public opinion has been so sharp and accusative that a reaction has set in.

It's interesting what the White House has tried to do about Nicaragua. It has stated the menace in such harsh terms that its proposal for another $100 million seems almost modest. If there is a threat to the security of the United States, as the President and the Secretaries of State and Defense say, why a mere $100 million? Why not a decision to intervene with our own troops to remove the threat they say is posed by the Sandinista Government?

This, of course, is precisely the decision the President is unwilling to face. He thinks he can deal with the problem by financing the rebels to fight the battle he insists is vital to the security of the Republic.

But Congress has its doubts, and so does the press. They have been told so many lies about the Nicaragua problem by the Administration that they are no longer willing to be overwhelmed by this latest propaganda campaign out of the White House.

Pat Buchanan's advertising campaign really has gone too far. His fastball is better than his control, and Congress and the press are onto it.

He has been trying to use the press and television to put over this latest vote on financing Nicaragua in Congress, but there have been so many deceptions and lies about Nicaragua that Congress and the Press are beginning to rebel.

They admire Mr. Reagan's television techniques, but are increasingly skeptical about his policy on Nicaragua. They would welcome an honest discussion of the problem, but have become the lie detectors of the Administration's argument.

CLAIMS ON CONTRAS IN DISPUTE

REAGAN'S CAMPAIGN FOR AID DRAWS ON CONTESTED STATISTICS, CHARGES

(By Joanne Omang)

In his weekend pleas for military aid to rebels in Nicaragua, President Reagan drew on the bywords of 40 years of staunch anticommunism to paint a dark and ominous picture of the Marxist government of Nicaragua and the threat it poses to the United States.

To make his grim portrait, the president invoked some disputed statistics and accusations and a panoply of devil figures, from Italy's Red Brigades to Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini. In the end, Reagan suggested that Congress' upcoming votes on the $100 million aid request will determine the course of the entire East-West conflict.

Grimmer versions of the appeal were drafted, according to White House officials. Those drafts included two grisly examples of alleged atrocities by the Sandinista rulers of Nicaragua in addition to the two Reagan used, the officials said.

On Saturday, Reagan charged in his regular nationwide radio address that Nicaraguan operatives "dress in freedom fighter [rebel] uniforms, go into the countryside, then murder and mutilate ordinary Nicaraguans." Asked for evidence, a senior official briefing reporters said it came from "sensitive intelligence sources that I'm not going to get into."

One of those is presumably a Sandinista defector, Alvaro Baldizon, who made the charge at a news conference two weeks ago but provided no evidence.

On many other points in his radio talk and in a nationally televised speech Sunday, Reagan used disputed information to draw a stark, black-and-white image of the Nicaraguan situation. For example:

His portrait of the counterrevolutionaries, or contras: "When the Sandinistas betrayed the revolution, many who had fought the old Somoza dictatorship literally took to the hills. . . [Today they have] more than 20,000 volunteers, and more come every day."

A 1982 Defense Intelligence Agency summary described the early contra groups as mainly remnants of Anastasio Somoza's National Guard, one of which, the "15 of September Legion," had carried out "terrorist" acts, the DIA said.

Provided with Central Intelligence Agency funding and advice beginning in 1982, the contras began to grow, recruiting an army of peasants unhappy with the Sandinistas. Their political leaders, held together in uneasy unity by CIA prodding, are civilian critics of the Sandinistas or disaffected Sandinista officials, but their military leadership still consists predominantly of old Somoza loyalists. Recent intelligence summaries provided to Congress put contra troop strength between 15,000 and 18,000, of whom a small fraction are inside Nicaragua.

The military threat: Nicaragua's "first target is Nicaragua's neighbors. . .the Nicaraguan military machine is more powerful than all its neighbors combined," Reagan said.

That careful wording seemed to suggest a Sandinista military invasion without flatly declaring it. Reagan also made skillful use of the language of possibility to describe a reddening Western Hemisphere. With Nicaragua as a base, the Soviets and Cubans "can become" the region's dominant power, and then "will be in a position to" threaten U.S. interests and "ultimately" Mexico. "Should that happen," millions of people would flee north, he said.

However, none of Nicaragua's neighbors has expressed concern over any Sandinista invasion, nor have administration officials called that a threat. They worry instead about infiltration of guerrilla trainers but admit that guerrillas move freely worldwide and do not require Nicaragua as a base.

On other occasions, Reagan has displayed pictures of a hemisphere glowing blue with the spread of democratically elected governments.

The global network of communism: Reagan placed "thousands of Cuban military advisers, contingents of Soviets and East Germans and all the elements of international terror—from the Palestine Liberation Organization to Italy's Red Brigades" in Nicaragua. He warned not only against "a second Cuba" but "a second Libya" in the region, and evoked Yasser Arafat, Muammar Qaddafi and the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in addition to the Warsaw Pact as enemies of the contra aid package.

"Now, we must make our decision," he said.

Estimates of the number of Cuban military advisers range from the Sandinistas' count of 200 to the administration's charge that all the Cuban construction workers, teachers and agricultural workers in Nicaragua are also military trainers.

While the PLO has an office in Nicaragua and international criminals have been seen in Managua, the administration has cited only secret sources for its allegations that "terrorist training camps" exist in Nicaragua.

The drug connection: A 1982 photograph of Federico Vaughn, an aide to Sandinista Interior Minister Tomas Borge, "loading an aircraft with illegal narcotics, bound for the United States," means that "top Nicaraguan officials are deeply involved in drug trafficking," Reagan said.

But Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman Cornelius Dougherty said earlier this year that "no evidence was developed to implicate the Minister of the Interior or other Nicaraguan officials."

The church connection: Reagan said "the entire Jewish community [was] forced to flee Nicaragua," while the Roman Catholic Church "has been singled out" for persecution, evangelical pastors have been tortured and people cannot "worship freely."

Nicaragua's few Jews closed their synagogue for lack of use, and most who left had backed Somoza. A 1983 State Department inquiry found no evidence of anti-Semitism.

While some Protestants have been harassed or their churches closed, mostly in contested Miskito Indian areas, others operate freely. The tortured pastor Reagan cited was working in the contested zone.

Nicaragua Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo is the leading opposition voice, but Catholics are split on the Sandinistas. U.S. Roman Catholic Church leaders critical of Nicaragua's internal policies are still among the sharpest opponents of aiding the contras.

The history of negotiations: "Ten times we have met and tried to reason with the Sandinistas. Ten times we were rebuffed," Reagan said. Special negotiator Philip C. Habib's recent trip was the 49th U.S. diplomatic mission to the region, Reagan said Saturday.

Habib did not go to Nicaragua, nor did those on many of the other trips. After bilateral discussion began in mid-1984, the Sandinistas complained that U.S. positions amounted to demands that they leave office, and U.S. officials broke off the talks.

PLANTATION, FL, DEMOCRATIC CLUB TO HONOR DENNIS WALTON, INTERNATIONAL UNION OF OPERATING ENGINEERS, LOCAL 675

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to salute an exceptional man. Dennis J. Walton is to be honored by his friends and colleagues on March 29, 1986, at the Plantation, FL, Democratic Club's annual testimonial dinner and dance at the Diplomat Hotel.

Dennis Walton is the business manager of the International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 675, of Pompano, FL. He simultaneously serves as chairman of the board of trustees of the unions $40 million pension fund. He is the president of his own consulting company, Fund Advisors, Inc. Mr. Walton is also registered as an investment advisor under the Security and Exchange Commission's Investment Advisors Act of 1940.

At 44 years of age, Mr. Walton has risen through the ranks of the Operating Engineers from a mere oiler to currently holding the position of chief executive officer. His hard work and perserverance has served as an inspiration to his fellow workers. His friends and coworkers have recognized the caliber of his professional work and his tireless energy by honoring him with this special dinner.

Mr. Walton has made a name for himself nationally as an expert in pension fund policy. He is a recognized speaker and author. His comments and articles have appeared in Financial World, Wall Street Journal, Business Week, Pension and Investment Age, among other publications. He has addressed the Presidential Commission on Pension Policy during its tenure.

He is recognized as one of the most aggressive and innovative trustees in the United States today. He is known as a pioneer of a pension investment program that directed the union's pension funds into real estate investments that have produced jobs for union contractors and employment for union members. He has been an outspoken critic of the way union pension funds should be handled by investment managers over the last 20 years.

Dennis Walton has truly been an asset to the Operating Engineers, Local 675 and to the labor movement. I am honored that I was asked to address this tribute dinner to honor him. His dedication, sincerity, and intensity are shared by few.

ROCK-N-ROLL ALIVE AND WELL IN CLEVELAND

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I comment on a story that appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer on Sunday, March 16, 1986.

Cleveland's top rock-n-roll station, WMMS-FM/100.7, was recently the recipient of Rolling Stone magazine's "Station of the Year Award." This is the seventh time that this station was awarded that honor.

Cleveland has always been a leader in the music industry, particularly in the area of commercial top 40 radio. Stations in Cleveland led the way in revolutionizing the FM radio format in the 1960's. As early as the 1950's many of Cleveland's disc jockeys were among the first to play rock-n-roll, as well as rhythm and blues music, as part of their regular programming.

Mr. Speaker, on Friday, March 21, 1986, the city of Cleveland will celebrate the birthday of America's first rock-n-roll concert. Thirty-four years ago Cleveland disc jockey, Alan Freed, hosted the first rock-n-roll concert. Mr. Freed is known in the music industry for coining the phrase "Rock-n-Roll." The Cleveland celebration for the birthday of rock-n-roll will be filled with city-wide events all day and into the night.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Cleveland are indeed proud of their rock-n-roll roots. We are all equally proud of the radio stations and disc jockeys that have made that music the most popular in the world.

Mr. Speaker, rock-n-roll is indeed alive and well in Cleveland, OH.

FEE ON IMPORTED OIL PROPOSED

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that would impose a fee on imported oil to protect the domestic market, encourage energy conservation, ensure that national security supply concerns are protected, and reduce the Federal and U.S. trade deficits.

A fee on imported oil would stem the decline of the domestic petroleum and refinery industries, save American jobs, and result in increased State and Federal tax revenues derived from related industries. New Mexico's economy would benefit because prices would then stabilize. Each $1 drop in the per barrel price of oil means that New Mexico loses an estimated $12 million in revenues.

My initiative would impose a duty of $8 per barrel on all petroleum products and petroleum entering into the United States after December 31, 1986. The duty would be imposed in corresponding percentages for fractions of barrels entering the country. The measure would generate approximately $100 billion over a 5-year period. The bill includes a national security waiver with respect to imports from Mexico, subject to the decision of the President of the United States. As a member of the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, I am committed to encouraging a full discussion and debate of this proposal by the Congress.

Without a healthy domestic energy industry, the Nation is vulnerable to outside economic pressures. National security cannot be maintained if the domestic oil industry is crippled. A drop in crude oil prices threatens other sources of energy such as natural gas and coal.

In part, one of my objectives in introducing this legislation is to encourage energy conservation. In 1973, Americans consumed 17.5 million barrels of oil a day. Today, consumption has fallen below 16 million barrels.

Prices are falling because we have conserved. Now that the price is not incentive enough to save and conserve, we may forget that the world's affordable supplies are still being depleted. The risk of unrest in the Middle East is ever present. Consumers might lose their incentive to drive energy efficient cars and stop caring about conserving energy, Congressman RICHARDSON said: "Serious deficit reduction demands an increase in revenues. A fee on imported oil would make a significant impact on reducing the deficit and at the same time would encourage domestic production—ensuring a viable industry and jobs here at home."

IMPROVEMENTS TO USDA EMERGENCY LIVESTOCK FEED ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

HON. RICHARD STALLINGS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am joined today by four of my distinguished colleagues in introducing legislation that is designed to consolidate and improve existing emergency livestock feed assistance programs administered by the Secretary of Agriculture.

I don't believe I need to remind this body of the economic difficulties confronting most if not all American farmers and ranchers today, but I must tell you that these very hardships are being further compounded by the Department of Agriculture's implementation of our Federal farm programs. Nowhere are these contradictions in purpose and reality more noticeable than in the Department's emergency feed assistance programs.

By the very nature of their industry, Mr. Speaker, our farmers continually face uncertain markets, uncertain weather, uncertain yields, and uncertain prices, and yet they persist year after year in producing this country's low-cost food and fiber. And when these farmers are hit by successive natural disasters that destroy their crops and threaten their livestock, where are our Federal disaster assistance programs?

There are no less than seven emergency feed assistance programs at the disposal of the Secretary, but rarely if ever, are any of these programs utilized with any effectiveness. To date, in my State of Idaho, only one program has been made available to our producers and that always seems to be "too little to late."

From all indications, the time has come to revamp and streamline these hodgepodge of emergency assistance programs into one workable and cost-effective program that truly helps our farmers and ranchers. The text of the bill follows.

DYING WITH DIGNITY

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, in losing Jake Javits, this Nation has experienced a great and personal loss. This loss would be even greater if it were not for the powerful and enduring legacy he bequeathed to all of us.

A few months ago, my committee had the high privilege of having Senator Javits testify for what was to be his last time. Very appropriately, that hearing was entitled "Dying with Dignity: Difficult Times, Difficult Choices." In his testimony, Jake Javits expressed a view of life and a view of death from which all of us could benefit. He testified, "Birth and death are the most singular events we experience and therefore the contemplation of death as of birth should be a thing of beauty."

His eloquent testimony that day, his personal struggle, and his commitment to protecting the rights of dying people best exemplify what "dying with dignity" means. In his passing, Jake Javits has left us with the challenge of protecting the rights of the dying. He challenged us to ensure the dying person's right to refuse medical treatment. He challenged us to establish and protect the dying person's right to have medical treatment.

As we look toward building a memorial to this honorable and dedicated public servant and his final mission, let us commit ourselves to meeting Jake Javits' challenge. Let us commit ourselves to establishing and protecting the rights of dying persons throughout this great Nation.

THERE IS NO LIGHT AT THE END OF THE PRESIDENT'S TUNNEL VISION

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues an article by my good friend and distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] which appeared today in the Los Angeles Times:

Far more than President Reagan's reputation as the "Great Communicator" will be at stake in Thursday's congressional vote on additional aid to the Nicaraguan contras.

In fact, a handful of swing votes could determine whether the United States throws its clout behind the forces of regional peace or weighs in on the side of a further militarization of the current conflict in Central America.

The President's request for $100 million in assistance for the contras is simply the latest wrinkle in a four-year effort to topple the Nicaraguan government. The Administration has already provided the contras with $100 million worth of supplies. It has imposed economic sanctions against the Sandinista regime. It has conducted massive military maneuvers in neighboring countries and adjacent waters. It has mined Nicaragua's harbors. It has thumbed its nose at international law and turned its back on the World Court. It has even written an assassination manual for the contras.

None of this has worked. More to the point, nothing of this sort holds any promise of working. Our own intelligence agencies agree that the contras have no chance of overturning the government in Managua; they have yet to hold even a single town in Nicaragua.

This is not to say that U.S. policy has had no effect. Unfortunately, it has had the wrong effects. Instead of facilitating real democracy, it has led to greater repression. Rather than inducing the Sandinistas to adopt a policy of genuine nonalignment, it has driven Nicaragua more firmly into the Soviet-Cuban embrace.

Most Americans deplore the fact that the Sandinistas have betrayed the democratic promises of their revolution. Most Americans agree that the present Sandinista regime daily tramples on the liberties of the Nicaraguan people. All Americans hope for a restoration of political pluralism and human rights in Nicaragua. And all Americans rightly insist that Nicaragua allow its neighbors the same freedom from outside interference that it claims for itself.

But funding a "secret army" in Central America to oppose the Sandinistas will not return political freedom to Nicaragua or protect Nicaragua's neighbors or wean Managua from Cuban influence.

It will, however, inflame historic Latin fears about "U.S. meddling." It will tie the United States to a force that has shown the same disdain for basic human decency that we rightly condemn in the Sandinistas. And if it fails, as it surely will, it may lead to the subsequent introduction of American combat forces.

The President disclaims—sincerely, I believe—any desire to send American troops to Nicaragua. But his policies are inexorably carrying us toward the point where we will have to choose between dispatching the Marines and putting up with the Sandinistas, humiliating as that might be.

Nicaragua presents the United States with two sets of problems. We have legitimate security concerns there, in the presence of Cuban advisers, the possibility of Soviet bases and Nicaragua's continuing interference in the affairs of its neighbors. We also have political concerns, in the denial of democracy and the abuse of human rights in Nicaragua.

The Sandinistas have indicated that, in exchange for U.S. promises not to destabilize their regime or invade their nation, they would declare Nicaragua off-limits to foreign bases and troops and accept verifiable arrangements guaranteeing Nicaragua's non-interference in the affairs of its neighbors.

Perhaps no agreement along these lines would work, but we should at least test Managua's sincerity. If a regional agreement subsequently broke down, we would then have a sounder basis for mobilizing our Latin American allies against the Sandinista regime.

By insisting, however, that the Sandinistas also agree to the establishment of a genuine democracy, which could lead to their removal from power, the Administration is attempting to achieve the impossible. Whatever else the Sandinistas may be willing to do, they clearly are not prepared to commit political suicide.

Consequently, by imposing unrealistic demands as a condition for a negotiated settlement, we will be not only unavailing in our efforts to promote political democracy in Nicaragua but also unsuccessful in containing Sandinista adventurism.

By obtaining an agreement on the security issues and reducing regional tensions, we have a far better chance of promoting our democratic values.

Our Latin American allies, many of whom have even more at stake in the region than we do, have begged us not to militarize the conflict further. The Contadora countries of Mexico, Colombia, Panama and Venezuela have publicly asked us to give their diplomatic efforts more time to bear fruit before we heat up the region with additional military aid. So, too, have almost all the other democracies in Latin America, ranging from mighty Argentina, at the far end of the hemisphere, to tiny Costa Rica, just across the Nicaraguan border.

Beneath all the inflated rhetoric about Sandinista armies rampaging as far north as Texas lie two choices. We can work with our friends in the region to promote an end to the fighting and a situation in which neighbors can live together in peace and without fear of outside intervention. Or we can follow a go-it-alone policy that, to be successful, will ultimately require the U.S. Marines.

The American people do not want any more Cubas in Central America, but neither do they want another Vietnam. It remains essential that we give diplomacy a chance. Our friends in the region ask this of us. Our own interests require it. Most of all, our ideals demand it.

PEACE OF MIND FOR $155: THE NEED FOR CATASTROPHIC HEALTH CARE

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 19, 1986

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the President has proposed a study on the need for catastrophic health insurance amendments.

We don't need a study.

We need action.

Let's save the money we'd spend on a study, and get started providing peace of mind to the Nation's seniors. I would like to include in the RECORD at this point an excellent recent editorial from the New York Times on this issue.

PEACE OF MIND FOR $155

What's the price of peace of mind for the aging American who fears financial ruin from severe illness? About $155 a year could buy a lot, says Otis Bowen, the Secretary of Health and Human Services. If so, why not put this bargain to Congress instead of burying it in a broader study?

President Reagan has asked Dr. Bowen to conduct a yearlong inquiry into "how the private sector and government can work together to address the problems of affordable insurance for those whose life savings would otherwise be threatened when catastrophic illness strikes." That command, in the State of the Union Message, puzzled the experts in the field. For only last November Dr. Bowen published an article describing a sensible plan by which Government alone could modify Medicare to guarantee just such coverage.

The 30 million elderly on the Medicare rolls are currently covered for 60 days of hospital care a year after they pay an initial $492 deductible for each period of illness. Illnesses lasting longer than 60 days can be financially devastating. Patients must contribute $123 a day for the next 30 days, and $246 a day after that.

The same Medicare patients must also fret about doctors' fees. The Government insurance pays 80 percent of approved doctors' charges after a $75 deductible. But with major surgery, the remaining 20 percent can total many thousands of dollars.

Dr. Bowen proposed to allay these fears and also simplify the coverage formulas. Since only a few Medicare patients ever need prolonged care, he would spread the cost of their "catastrophic" illness among all 30 million plan members. Estimates developed for the Social Security Advisory Council, which he chaired, suggested that a new premium of $39 a year could cover unlimited days in a hospital after a patient had paid the $492 deductible on each of two spells of illness. An additional annual premium of $116, he calculated, could cover all doctors' bills above a patient's contribution of $350. In any year, then, a patient's maximum exposure would be $1,489, a fraction of the risk he now runs.

Some spokesmen for the aging object, with reason, that this plan fails to address the more costly and frightening prospect of long-term nursing-home care. While that problem certainly demands urgent study, the Bowen plan would still offer most Medicare beneficiaries a genuine saving over the $500 to $800 a year it costs to purchase private insurance covering what Medicare won't pay. Perhaps 90 percent of those on Medicare now allay their anxieties with such "Medigap" insurance.

Why then another study? Apparently to allay the fears of the sellers of Medigap. They stand to lose a big piece of business if the Government extends its coverage. They could not compete because they have no captive clientele of 30 million and bear heavy selling and administrative costs. They therefore welcome the President's call for a broader study, including nursing-home care and care of premature babies, because it would defer action on the Bowen approach.

How to combine public and private insurance programs to provide that still broader coverage certainly merits study. But why not proceed with insurance against catastrophic illness when an affordable remedy seems at hand?

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, March 20, 1986, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.
